Sir, there are worse things than rioting, bad as that is. There are worse things than occasional rioting. It is not common in our country. It is the accident of a day. It is an occurrence growing out of peculiar and particular circumstances, not often recurring. An occasional riot is made a cause of alarm now, and we are actually to sit here and make provision for it, as though it were a fixed disease, as though it were the business of this Government to watch over elections, and to watch over them with arms. I think this is worse than rioting. Would you not rather have in your county, sir, an occasional riot at an election than a permanent military force established there, through whose ranks you were to march to the polls? according to whose taste you were to regulate your conduct? who were to judge of it upon the moment, they on one side of politics chosen by a dominant party, and you on the other side? Would you like to march through their ranks, to run the gauntlet, in order to exercise your right of suffrage?

Sir, I utterly deprecate this. Give me many riots before you fasten upon my back such a provision as this is. I am willing to suppress all lawlessness everywhere, and especially am I behind no gentleman here in my readiness to vote any force, at any cost, that may be necessary to restore peace and safety to the people of this District. I think that is eminently necessary, and I regret that we have not been able to accomplish it in a manner somewhat more reconcilable with what I consider to be sound principle on this subject. These are the views which I entertain. To avoid all difficulty about conferring this appointment on the Vice President, or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or the two together, I have changed the provision so as to vest the appointment in the court, as ancillary to their functions in the administration of the law. All depend upon that at last. Your guards, when they shall have performed their duty to the utmost, will have done nothing unless your courts follow up their preliminary proceedings by an efficient punishment of offenders, and it ought to be promptly administered. I think if my friend from Mississippi had thought of it, he would have added a section that the judge instantly, on being notified of any high criminal offense, as burglary or murder, or any felony, should hold a court and try the man, if possible, the next day.

I regret to have detained the Senate even with a word, for I know they are weary of this subject; but I have felt myself called upon to say thus much.

Mr. GREEN. I am not willing to see this question made a political one; I am not willing to see it tortured into a party question; I am not disposed to see it represented as a contest between Democrats and Americans, or between Democrats and Republicans, or between any other parties. I regard it as no party question; but a question of peace, of order, and of protection to person and property. It is in that light, and that light alone, that I have viewed it from the beginning. I never believed that this force was to be used to build up one party, and break down another, at elections; and I know that if it should be used for that purpose, the man who so uses it will be liable to indictment, prosecution, and to punishment; and hence I apprehend no difficulty from that source, on that score. We see an urgent necessity for some police force. It is admitted by every Senator in this body. How shall we accomplish that end? Congress has unlimited admitted authority over that subject. How shall they exercise it in conformity with the Constitution? It is believed that to make a police force independent of the city government, will make it more efficient to protect Congress, foreign ministers, their agents and attaches, and to protect persons and property, than if you vest it in the city government.

Then the Senator from Kentucky says the chief of this police force ought not to be appointed by the Executive, because it will increase Executive patronage. I do not think that, adding one appointment to thirty thousand, will be like the feather to the camel's back—break it. I do not believe there is any danger wrapped up in it, when this man has no vote for a presidential office; for a congressional office, for a senatorial office, when he has no voice outside of the District of Columbia. I cannot see that any danger is embodied in the proposition.

When it was intimated by the Senator from New Hampshire that the past efficient head of the police, Captain Goddard, was removed for political reasons, I went to him and told him privately that that was not correct; but he has not corrected his statement. I, therefore, think it my duty to correct it publicly. It was a mistake into which the Senator from New Hampshire fell. Captain Goddard was not removed for political reasons. He was removed in consequence of a misunderstanding between him and the then Mayor, Mr. Maury. It happened in this wise: Captain Goddard is a bold, efficient, practical man, with no adulation, no sycophancy; a fire broke out in the city one night, and the Mayor went up to see it. Captain Goddard was not there; the Mayor met him coming up, and said, "Why have you not been here?" Without any explanation, conscious of his own integrity, he said, "I have been attending to my business elsewhere." It offended the Mayor, some words passed, and Captain Goddard resigned. This is the communication made to me by an old resident of the city this day. I merely mention it for the purpose of showing that no politics have been mixed up with this guard; and I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not suppose that this is a political movement. It is not striking at the American party, or any other party. It is simply a movement made for the protection of persons and property.

When he indicated the idea that the Executive patronage ought to be limited, and the power of appointment vested in the Vice President, I remarked that we had no constitutional power to do it; that under the Constitution, we must either vest the appointment in the President, in the heads of the Departments, or in the courts of justice. He repeats his asseveration again, but takes care not to make his amendment that way. The amendment now is to vest the appointment in the court. If he believes that we have the power to give the appointment to the Vice President, why does he not propose to vest it there? I will tell you why. Congress, while it is the executive Legislature for the District of Columbia, as was remarked by the Senator from Tennessee, is not vested with unlimited power. It cannot confiscate private property; it cannot create a title of nobility. There are ten thousand things it cannot do. The Constitution imposes restraints and restrictions upon it; and there are questions of right paramount to constitutions which Congress dare not trample under foot, even in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding exclusive power of legislation is given here. "Exclusive" means "only;" that is, Congress is the only legislative power for this District.

The Constitution says in express words that all appointments shall be made by the President, unless Congress shall direct otherwise; and how may Congress direct otherwise? Congress may vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, the courts of law, or the heads of Departments. But whether that be true or not, is an immaterial question now. We all want an efficient police, the Senator from Kentucky as much as we; and I do not think he apprehends any serious difficulty growing out of this patronage. I do not suppose he believes it will grow up to a magnitude to endanger the liberties of this country, or if he does, I think he must be alone in that supposition. We believe the protection of persons and property in this District demands of us to exert our right, to demand the means for that protection. Even if it is not the best means, time and experience will enable us to perfect it; and the Senator from Kentucky and myself, and our colleagues on this side of the House, can all cooperate in the accomplishment of this great common end—the protection of ourselves and the property of the District.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The gentleman seems to me to manifest a particular spirit of a controversial character with me.

Mr. GREEN. Oh no.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Why, he asks me, did I not propose to appoint the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, as the men to exercise this power? It is because he objected to it, and I would rather please the gentleman, and I therefore proposed the court, thinking theirs was an extremely appropriate and kindred sort of power to that which you were vesting in this new police, and that they would work together very well. I never did say that this was a political movement. On the contrary, I said that if it could be administered in the spirit in which I knew it was proposed, there would be no danger, but I have endeavored to show its liability to abuse.

If I apprehend any danger from it, the gentleman says he rather imagines I shall stand alone. Sir, I am as little likely to be apprehensive of danger as the honorable Senator. I say the thing is evil in itself; it is the seed of evil. It is not necessary to the purpose in view; nor necessary to the occasion; and it is therefore that I have endeavored to lay my views of this subject before the Senate, for them to decide—that is all. I have no reason to apprehend that it is intended as an abuse; that it is intended, for the present, as a political movement. I am sure it is not here; but in worse hands it may be used for bad purposes. It involves principles that I do not think are safe, and which may be extended greatly for other purposes. It is therefore that I wish to check everything, as far as I can, that seems to me irreconcilable with the spirit of this Government, or its principles, no matter whether it be great or small. We can establish the object we had in view without the characteristics and features of this measure which I think make it liable to abuse. Whatever my fault may be, even in the eyes of the Senator from Missouri, there can be no more than this in it: that I am too careful of what I regard as public liberty.

Mr. GREEN. I hope that I have evinced no disposition to court a controversy with the Senator from Kentucky. I have disputed some of his propositions. If that is to be construed into a desire to enter into a controversial spirit, then I may reply to the charge, that whenever he gravely presents, with all the sanctions of reputation and character that he possesses, and possesses justly, a position that I believe to be untenable under the Constitution, I regard it as my right to correct it. But at the same time, it is only given as my own view. It is not given authoritatively, and I hope he will not so understand me on any occasion. I have believed, as he believes, that we need this strengthening of the police force. He thinks it is best now. It is the proposition of the Senator from Illinois to vest the appointing power in a judge that is now before us. If he thought the Vice President was a more safe depository of this power, I had supposed it was open to his proposition; but he did not deem it proper to make it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. It is the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. I merely renewed his motion in the Senate after it had been voted down in Committee of the Whole, without calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. GREEN. I understand. I am speaking of this present proposition. The Senator from Illinois made it. He need not try to shirk from it and throw it on the shoulders of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no shirking from it. I said that I renewed it. It is not an attempt to shirk from it. I merely meant to have the Senator from Missouri understand that it was the original proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. I supposed that probably he might not have been paying attention, and did not know that it was his original proposition. That was why I stated it, not with a view of shirking the responsibility of it.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator is very much mistaken. I do take notice of a matter to which I think proper to turn my attention. I knew that the Senator from Kentucky had made that proposition in a different body, in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; but in the Senate proper, the Senator from Kentucky has never made that proposition. The Senator from Illinois did make it; and it is therefore his proposition. The Senator from Kentucky had the right to move to amend it, and he did not. But enough of that. I think it best to leave it in the hands of the Executive. He is responsible, under the Constitution, to the whole country. The court is without responsibility anywhere. There is a second reason. If

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 93.

the President should make an injudicious selection, here stands the Senate, representing all the States of the Union, to protect us—the very object of this bill. If the President be oversighted, misled, or deceived, the Senate can protect him; but if the judge alone should be deceived, oversighted, or misled, who is to protect him? No Senate is to pass upon it in a second view; there is no secondary power to pass it under review; and hence I think that it is far better to adhere to the original bill than to accept the proposition of the Senator from Illinois.

As to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky about various other matters—political questions—I did not assert that he said this was a party question, but the train of his remark was calculated, I think, to lead to the belief that there was some party feeling mixed up with it. If there is, it is not with me; and, therefore, I thought it proper that I should make the disclaimer. I did it in justice to him, in justice to the country, and in justice to that part of the Senate which supports this bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I shall never object to the gentleman's correcting me at any time; I shall be glad to have any gentleman correct me when I am wrong. The Senator complains as though I had interfered with his right of asserting and maintaining his opinions.

Mr. GREEN. Not at all.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have said no such thing. I have treated the gentleman with perfect respect. It was he, on the contrary, I thought, that manifested a controversial spirit towards me. He sees no harm, and perhaps I am wrong in supposing that I do see that this is susceptible of abuse. That is all that I have endeavored to call his attention to, and that of other Senators, to judge whether it be so or not. The Senator can see none, and if I were in his condition I should see none. He has told us that he has full confidence in the present President, and all the Presidents that are to succeed him. With full confidence in them, I might have the same assurance that there would be no abuse; but worse Presidents may come than we have. We know not who they may be; and, therefore, we ought not to legislate for a good President only, but upon the supposition that we may have a bad one at some time or other, and see that a measure which is liable to abuse, susceptible of abuse, but which we intend for a good purpose, may not be abused by him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This bill provides for raising an auxiliary force: for what? To execute the civil laws of the District of Columbia? Auxiliary to whom? Is it to be made auxiliary to the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, or is it to be made auxiliary to that power in the District of Columbia which executes and administers the laws? I regard the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky as a very material one, and I shall give it my hearty vote. The simple reason for doing so I will state. The court of the District is the power which is to enforce the civil law of the District, and the appointment of the officers for that executive force which is to enforce the administration of the law, should belong to that court in preference to being placed in the power of the Executive, as the commander of the militia, the Army, and the Navy of the United States. I shall, therefore, vote for this amendment. I shall not detain the Senate by going into any examination of the subject.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is aware that this court has no jurisdiction of crimes? It is the court that tries civil cases alone.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say a word in regard to a remark that fell from the Senator from Missouri. He seemed to think that I had been wanting in an act of justice or courtesy in regard to a statement which I had made about the removal of Captain Goddard. The fact was, that I got my information from an old citizen of the District to-day, and the Senator got his from an old citizen of the District to-day, and he told me who he was.

We did not get the same information, and that is the reason I did not make the explanation. I have no doubt the Senator from Missouri had full confidence in what his informant told him. He told me who it was, but I had a conversation with another gentleman, who represented to me the other side.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator did not tell me who his informant was, and I told him who was mine.

Mr. HALE. I will state the fact. Captain Goddard was a Whig. The mayor that removed him was a Democrat, so called. The Democratic mayor came in and Captain Goddard went out. Perhaps the acts did not sustain to each other the relation of cause and effect, but they were what old Mr. Weller would call an astonishing coincidence to say the least of it, [laughter,] that Captain Goddard, who had been a Whig and was retained in office while there were Whig mayors, should go out when a Democrat came in. That there was some such pretext as that which the honorable Senator has suggested I have no sort of doubt, but that the cause of offense lay deeper than that, I think perfectly clear. I shall vote for this amendment.

Mr. GREEN. Let me correct the Senator by only a word in justice both to the memory of Mayor Maury and Captain Goddard. Captain Goddard remained in office for more than six months after Mr. Maury came in, and it was only after the difficulty of which I spoke sprang up that he was dismissed—not dismissed, but permitted gracefully to resign; but even after that, I am authorized to say that Mayor Maury remarked, "it was a great mistake, I ought to have retained Mr. Goddard." I say this in justice to both parties, to show that no political feelings were mixed up with it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STUART. I desire to renew the motion to strike out the fifth section. I do not intend to make any speech about it, but it strikes me that that is a portion of the bill which is liable to the abuse suggested, and that it is liable to abuse on account of importunity upon the President of the United States, on any occasion when there shall be a large assemblage here, to add one hundred men just for the purpose of getting the pay—a constant importunity upon him, and there is no corresponding benefit to result from retaining it in the bill. I think that power which lies in the local government, to call out at all times an additional citizen force, is better for an emergency, or at least it will answer for an emergency; and that this provision is liable to abuse, and liable to very serious objection. The President will be importuned, even against his will, to add a hundred men at two dollars a day, at any time when there may be an additional assemblage of persons. I renew the motion to strike out the fifth section, and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I hope not; we can get through with this bill in a very few minutes.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, there being, on a division—yeas 15, nays 22.

Mr. WILSON. On the motion made by the Senator from Michigan, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Doolittle, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Sidel, Stuart, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yulee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Dixon, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—21.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have one more amendment to propose. It is an experiment that we are making, and for a necessity that I hope will not last long. I think if the city is once well expurgated, we may hope for a long continuance of peace and quiet; and, therefore, I propose that this act shall continue in force for one year only from its passage.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the honorable Senator that this act repeals all the existing laws, and therefore repeals the law establishing the auxiliary guard of thirty men that we now have; and if you continue this act only one year, at the end of that year the auxiliary guard of thirty men will be at an end also.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. We shall be here next year, and can provide for it. My amendment is to add as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for one year only from its passage.

Mr. BROWN. All that I have to say in reply to that is, that at the end of the year you will have the same scenes you have now. There will be the same necessity for reenacting this law. If it shall ever appear that the law is unnecessary, you can repeal it, but as to limiting it to a year it amounts simply to a limitation that leaves the rowdies to go away for a year and come back at the end of that time.

Mr. SEWARD. I will barely say that I think there is an epidemic in crime as there is in everything else, and that these sudden outbreaks which appear in our cities are occasional and temporary. I quite agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky that this trouble once gotten through with, we shall probably have peace and quiet for a long time thereafter. I have felt the want of such a limitation of this bill as he has proposed, but I should not like to limit it to one year, and I suggest to my honorable friend to confine the operation of the bill to two years. Give it two years' trial.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I accept the modification and say two years.

Mr. HALE. It would be better to say three years. We shall have a Republican President then. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. One word. At the end of two years you will have, as I now predict, if you adopt this amendment, a state of profound quiet, peace, and order; nobody will suppose there is any need for an auxiliary guard or a guard of any other sort; but take it away, and in one month after the time is out, you will have all these scenes of disorder again. Congress is here, but it takes Congress three, four, five, or six months to act, and all that time you will have murder, riot, bloodshed, and disorder, in your streets.

The amendment was rejected. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time. On its passage,

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Dixon, Douglas, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foster, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Crittenden, Doolittle, Hale, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, and Trumbull—9.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the title of the bill was amended by striking out the words "public and private," before "property," and inserting "persons and," so as to read:

A bill to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of persons and property, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject.

ARMY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had concurred in the first second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontiers of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four regiments of volunteers, and had concurred in the eighth amendment of the Senate with an amendment striking out the words, "surgeons and assistant surgeons." The eighth amendment of the Senate provided for detailing the commissaries, quartermasters, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, of the new regiments from the regular Army.

On motion of Mr. PUGH, the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

ADMISSION OF OREGON.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator allow me to report the Oregon bill?

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the constitution of Oregon, have directed me to report a bill (S. No. 239) for the admission of Oregon into the Union, and to ask that the constitution be printed.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the constitution was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 5, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. MORSELL.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

LIMITATION OF ACTION.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to limit the commencement of action in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct, in the District of Columbia; when the Speaker signed the same.

NEW REGIMENT BILL.

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire very much to bring before the House this morning the volunteer bill with the Senate amendments. The amendments of the Senate are eight in number. Some of them are merely nominal, one dependent on the other. The Committee on Military Affairs have had the subject under consideration, and propose to concur in all the amendments of the Senate except one. They do not change the principle of the bill. If I can get the consent of the House to take up the bill, I will briefly explain the amendments.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I object.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended—ayes 101, noes 25.

The bill was then taken up, and the amendments separately considered.

First amendment:

Section one, page 1, line five, after the word "authorized" strike out the words "and required."

Mr. QUITMAN. I will say, in explanation of that amendment, that the bill, as it passed the House, authorized and required the President to call into service the regiment raised for service in Texas. The Senate propose to strike out the words "and required," so as to leave it discretionary to call out a regiment or not, as the necessities of the service may require. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand the effect of this amendment to be to leave it discretionary with the President whether he will call out the regiments authorized or not.

Mr. QUITMAN. That is the effect of it.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Page 3, section three, strike out the whole of this section, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the officers of said regiment of mounted men shall be appointed or selected in the manner prescribed by the laws of Texas.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have only this to say, in explanation of this amendment, that another section places the organization of all the regiments under the regulations of the several States in which they are raised. The object of the section will therefore be accomplished, without this special provision. We therefore recommend that the House concur in this amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the President has not the appointment of the officers of these new regiments?

Mr. QUITMAN. No, sir; they are appointed under the regulations existing in the States where they are raised.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Page 4, section four, line six, after the word "the" strike out the words "northern and northwestern."

Mr. QUITMAN. I will say that the object of this amendment is to extend the operation of the regiments to be raised to the whole Indian frontier. The bill as it passed the House restricts their operation to the northern and northwestern frontier. This simply removes the restriction, and allows it to extend to the whole Indian frontier.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Page 4, section four, line eleven, strike out "four," and insert in lieu thereof "two."

Mr. QUITMAN. That amendment is the most material amendment, and the Committee on Military Affairs recommend a concurrence in it. The original bill, as reported to the House and passed, authorized the President to call into service four additional regiments, besides the Texas mounted regiment. The amendment of the Senate reduces the number of additional regiments to two. For the purpose of expediting the passage of the bill, the committee recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Supposing that the Senate of the United States represent more particularly the views of the Administration, I concurred with a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs in recommending a concurrence in this amendment. At the same time, I adhere to the opinion which I expressed when the bill was originally before the House, that we should send a larger number of troops to Utah instead of a smaller number, for the reason that I believe there would be less bloodshed. I have no doubt myself on the question.

I wish at the same time to correct a statement which appears in the debate of Friday, which relates to the cost of the United States Army establishment. I see by a misprint in the Globe I am represented as saying that the cost of the Army is $7,500,000. I said about fifteen million dollars. Adding the cost of arsenals, and other military expenses of the Government, the amount will be increased to about nineteen million dollars. Then adding the cost of the public buildings, and the entire expense will be about twenty million dollars. This is the explanation I wish to make.

Mr. PHELPS. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS,] I will say with reference to the debate which took place in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on Friday last, upon the deficiency bill, that I was also guilty of a little inaccuracy. I concurred with the gentleman from Iowa in stating that the annual cost of maintaining the Army of the United States was about fifteen million dollars. Since then, I have had placed in my hands an official document, from which I find that the annual expense of supporting the United States Army for the year ending June 30, 1856, was $13,577,559 61; and that the cost for the year ending June 30, 1857, was $13,802,860 76.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a point of order. Is this debate pertinent to the question pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is taking a rather wide range.

Mr. PHELPS. I have made the only explanation I desired.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to state whether the reduction proposed by the committee is in accordance with the wishes of the Executive?

Mr. QUITMAN. I have no information on that point, save from what appears in the debates of the Senate. I had an interview, in the latter part of last week, with the Secretary of War; and he informed me that the War Department only desired expedition in this matter, and was quite willing to receive the Senate's amendment to the House bill. I did not learn whether there was any particular preference for five or for three regiments. My own opinion, however, is, that the Administration would prefer the privilege of calling out five regiments, if deemed necessary. But I know that it was stated in the committee room that, in all probability, no more than three regiments would be required, including the Texas regiments. Under that supposition, while I concur with my friend from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS,] in the opinion that five regiments will be needed, yet, as immediate action is so important, the Committee on Military Affairs recommend concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to ask whether the amendments made in the Senate leave the Texas regiments on the same ground as the other—that is, leaving it discretionary with the Executive to call them out, or whether it is imperative?

Mr. QUITMAN. On the same footing exactly.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to submit some remarks upon the bill, and as they are appropriate to this amendment, I propose to do so now. Without intending to bring about delay or disadvantage to the public service, I think the House ought to refuse to concur in this amendment. This bill proposes to fix the number of troops to be furnished by any one State at not less than a regiment. That would operate very unequally; and I think that we ought to give a fair opportunity to all the States desiring to furnish a proportion of troops, to do so. I am authorized to say that Indiana is prepared to furnish two regiments; but if there are only two regiments to be called into service, it is not right that only two States should have the privilege of furnishing them. Therefore, I think this bill ought to be amended so as to permit a State to furnish a company or battalion. In order to get the bill to a stage where that can be done, I propose that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate.

If the bill passes in its present form, there will be some twenty or thirty regiments tendered to the Executive. Two of these only will be accepted; and the consequence will be, that, at the next session of Congress, large bills will be presented for indemnity by men who will have raised companies at their own expense, and have been refused to be mustered into service.

For my part, I do not think that two regiments are sufficient for the wants of the service; and I will state why. Both these regiments, it is understood, are to go with the Utah expedition, or else to garrison those forts from which the regular troops are to be withdrawn to be sent to Utah. This bill gives the State of Texas one regiment, to be raised within her own borders, for self-defense against the Indians. I have no objection to that part of the bill; but a portion of the country where the citizens have need to raise troops for self-defense against the Indians more than anywhere else, has been wholly overlooked in this bill. I refer to the Territory of New Mexico, on the frontiers of which some ninety thousand Indians of the most warlike character are continually pressing—a Territory which contains men accustomed to fight Indians, and who would be very glad to have permission to defend themselves. This they cannot now do, because the intercourse laws are enforced there; and whenever the people in that Territory take up arms against the Indians, they are liable to have the troops of the United States arrayed against them.

There are serious defects in this bill. In my opinion two regiments will be wholly inadequate; and I think that this is as good a point as any other at which to refuse concurrence. In order to get the bill in a condition where it can be modified and perfected, I submit a motion—in order to get the sense of the House on the amount of force to be called out—to strike out the word "two" from the Senate's amendment, and insert the word "five."

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise simply to notice an allusion made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] to a remark made by me in the Committee on Military Affairs. I arrived in the committee room after the bill, with the Senate's amendments, had been disposed of by the committee. Some gentleman, I believe the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] inquired if the Administration would be satisfied with the three volunteer regiments? I remarked that I had learned that the President would be satisfied with the bill as it came from the Senate, although I had had no direct communication with him or the Secretary of War on that point. I presume, however, as the discretionary power is given to the President to call out these regiments as the public necessities of the country may require, he cannot object to the number being enlarged to five, if such is the pleasure of this House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that his amendment is unnecessary; for if the House non-concur in the Senate amendments, then the bill will stand as it was sent from this House.

Mr. OTERO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words of the point made by the gentleman from Indiana. He has referred to the Territory of New Mexico and its condition at the present time. One regiment is provided for the State of Texas—the only State which has provision for its protection; the only State which has an overflowing treasury; the only State which has almost in every hundred miles a military post; which has military posts all over it. For that State, sir, you provide a regiment by special provision; and for the Territories, which the Government is bound to protect, there is no protection provided. In the Territory of New Mexico we have men willing and able to protect our people. Instead, however, of receiving any large amount of assistance from the regular Army, we afford assistance to it. We furnish transportation and escorts for the army to Utah. Yet for this Territory not a single provision is made in this bill. The Navajos and Apaches have been committing great depredations there. The Indian bureau can furnish conclusive proof of this fact. The troops who were stationed there have been withdrawn for service in Utah. Supplies and assistance are furnished to the army for Utah from that Territory, which is proven by the fact that Captain Marcy has gone there for those very supplies. I therefore hope that the House will agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, for a non-concurrence in the Senate amendment, and to secure an increase of the volunteer force, in order that a regiment may be raised in New Mexico. I had hoped that, under the bill of this House, New Mexico would have been entitled to raise one regiment. The men have been enlisted there for that service; but if the Senate amendment prevails, she will, I am afraid, be left unprotected for.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is well enough for the House to know that if the word "two" be stricken out and "five" inserted, there will be six regiments voted instead of five; there will be one for Texas and five beside. I would allay the fear of the Delegate from New Mexico, and at the same time justify the committee, by stating that no difficulty can be seen in the way of the President ordering any one of these regiments of volunteers which may be raised to the Indian frontier where there may be trouble.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman must perceive that the Territory desires to protect itself by raising men for that purpose who have for years been trained to the peculiar warfare of the Indian frontier. Owing to the intercourse laws, however, they are unable to go out and chastise the Indians unless they have the consent of the General Government. Their property is carried off before their faces by these Indians, who ought to be punished.

I withdraw my amendment, and move a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate, which will leave five regiments provided for.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going to suggest to the gentleman what he has just done. I confess that I do not concur with him in a remark he threw out in reference to the intercourse law. I do not think it has anything to do with the question; it applies under different circumstances and to other people.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will say a word. I concur in the main in what has been said by the Delegate from New Mexico. If this war with the Mormons continues, then a greater increase of force will be demanded. This bill will clothe the President with power, if the Senate amendment be non-concurred in, to call into service four regiments of volunteers, in addition to the regiment provided for Texas. If there can be an amicable adjustment of the difficulty, there may exist no necessity for calling them out; but, on the contrary, if the war goes on—and I do not pretend to an exact knowledge of all of the military necessities of the country—I should suppose a larger increase than five regiments will be required for its successful prosecution and speedy termination. It seems to me, that to avoid crippling the Administration, and in order to provide the means, not only to protect the frontier, but to secure peace in Utah, it is right that we should refuse to concur in the Senate's amendment, and leave the discretion to the President to call into service the number of regiments proposed in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I make this remark without having had an opportunity to consult the Committee on Military Affairs, who, of course, are better informed on this subject; and I make it because I have been a frontiersman on the extreme frontier for the last twenty years of my life. I have seen the sufferings of the frontiersmen, and I know that they have not been overstated. In my own State we have some two thousand troops. I learn that they have been ordered away to Utah. With that force there, even, our citizens have been murdered and despoiled of their property. During the last winter, depredations have been committed upon them; and it is believed that the Indians from north of Red river have been engaged in stealing horses and taking them to Utah, to be used there by the Mormons for their mounted troops.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask the gentleman if these Indians who come down into Texas, do not pass also through the Territory of New Mexico?

Mr. REAGAN. They must of necessity pass through the Territory of New Mexico. I am, of course, less informed about the condition of New Mexico than the Delegate from that Territory is; but I have no doubt that its exposed situation is such that it requires the action of the Federal Government in protecting its citizens against the incursions of Indians.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Did the gentleman say that they had two thousand regular troops now in Texas?

Mr. REAGAN. There were two thousand up to the time the orders arrived for them to move towards Utah. They are now moving. I believe that most of the troops in Texas have already received orders to move. That frontier is now exposed, and the Indians are continually making inroads on the settlements, murdering the citizens and carrying away their property.

Mr. LOVEJOY. To what extent does the order for removal go?

Mr. REAGAN. My understanding is that it extends to the whole force. The President informed me that he should order the troops in Texas and in Kansas to Utah. I do not know that the entire force will be removed; but I imagine that nearly the whole of it will be removed.

There is another fact which ought to address itself to the attention of gentlemen upon this floor. Many here speculate upon the protection of the frontier of the United States, and look to calculations of dollars and cents. It is to be remembered that immigration, the occupation of the public lands, the settling of the Territories of the country, is the great instrumentality for reducing the Territories of the United States to civilization and improvement, and it can only be done by the fostering care and protection of the Federal Government.

Any man who has been upon the frontier, and who has seen the difficulties that surround the frontier settlements, and their insecurity when unprotected by the Government, will at once appreciate the necessity of giving them ample protection. I need scarcely remark that the fact of a double line of frontier now being created by the settlement of the Pacific coast, that the fact that Utah and New Mexico stand isolated and surrounded by frontier, and the fact that the lines of travel across the continent are necessary to be protected, create a necessity for an enlarged military force to give that protection to the country which is necessary to secure the advancement of the frontier settlements of the country, and the development of the great undeveloped resources of the western wilderness.

In view of these facts, and of the fact that we are now, perhaps, involved in a war with Utah, which may require a largely increased force, I have deemed it not out of place to suggest that I would like to see the House refuse to concur in the amendment of the Senate, and leave the President authority to order out five regiments instead of three.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move the previous question.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will that cover all the amendments?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. QUITMAN. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana will allow me to offer an amendment, in behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, to one of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move to amend the eighth amendment of the Senate by striking out the words "surgeons and assistant surgeons." That will leave the surgeons and assistant surgeons to be appointed in the States in which the regiments are raised, instead of being appointed by the President. This is desired by the Secretary of War, inasmuch as there are not enough surgeons in the Army for any to be detached for this service. The Military Committee therefore recommend that they shall be selected by the States, according to the State laws. They propose, however, to concur in that portion of the Senate's amendment which provides that quartermasters and commissaries shall be appointed by the President. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put; being upon agreeing to the fourth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by Mr. SAVAGE, who said: I desire to understand this question. I understand that the Committee on Military Affairs recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. LOVEJOY. No, sir; the committee recommend a concurrence.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask permission of the House to make a simple explanation of the character of the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to ask the gentleman if these amendments were referred to that committee?

Mr. KELSEY. I object to debate.

Mr. QUITMAN. The action of the Military Committee has been misunderstood.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. It is objected to.

Mr. AVERY. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, so that we may understand what the recommendation of the committee is.

Mr. KELSEY. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have but a word of explanation to make.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I must object, unless the House will allow a reply to be made to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. QUITMAN. I beg the gentleman to understand that he does injustice to the committee. The committee has been misunderstood here.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. QUITMAN. I shall occupy less time than this discussion has already done. Upon the publication in the newspapers of the amendments adopted by the Senate, the Committee on Military Affairs of this House immediately took up those amendments to ascertain whether I, as chairman, should report to the House, when the amendments came up, in favor of concurring or of non-concurring. We determined to act promptly. We acted in the belief and upon information that the President did not desire more than two additional regiments besides the Texas regiment. The committee preferred the bill which they had reported to the House, giving the President authority to call out four regiments, but they yielded to the wishes of the War Department upon the subject, and I have reported the action of the committee. Since then the Committee on Military Affairs have held no meeting, but I have received information which convinces me, in my own mind, that the Administration, upon reflection, would prefer the power of calling out five regiments. Believing that, under the circumstances, the Senate will recede from its amendment, I shall, although I have moved to concur, vote, as I believe a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs will, not to concur, but to leave the bill, in this respect, as it originally passed the House.

Mr. STANTON. I understood the gentleman to say that the Secretary of War, in person, informed him that he would be satisfied with either the House or the Senate bill. Is that so?

Mr. QUITMAN. Yes, sir; on the ground that dispatch is important. The Administration would be satisfied with either, but I take it that they would prefer the House bill.

The call of the roll was then resumed and completed, with the following result—yeas 113, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—102.

So the fourth amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Pending the vote,

Mr. WORTENDYKE stated that his colleague, Mr. HUYLER, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. BONHAM. As a member of the Military Committee, I voted "ay." I understood, however, the chairman of the committee to say, that it would be desirable that the Administration should be at liberty to employ the entire four regiments. Is that so?

Mr. MORGAN. I object to debate.

Mr. BONHAM. Then I beg leave to change my vote, and vote "no."

Mr. AVERY. I voted "ay," thinking that that was the wish of the committee. I change my vote now, in accordance with the will of the committee, and vote "no."

Mr. HALL, of Ohio, asked leave to vote, stating that he was not within the bar, but in the lobby, when his name was called.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Is not this whole room considered within the bar?

The SPEAKER. The Hall is.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Well, I understand the gentleman to say he was within the Hall.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I was outside the first door.

The SPEAKER. According to the understanding of the Chair, the gentleman is not entitled to vote.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. Then I ask unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. KELSEY. I object; as I always will under such circumstances.

After the announcement of the vote,

Mr. HUGHES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bishop, Blair, Biscoe, Bonham, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—100.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth amendments of the Senate were severally concurred in.

The eighth amendment was reported, as follows:

At the end of the fifth section, add:

Except the quartermasters, commissaries, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, who shall be detailed from their respective departments in the regular Army of the United States.

Mr. QUITMAN. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend concurrence with the eighth amendment, with an amendment, as follows:

Insert, after the word "quartermasters," the word "and," and strike out the words "surgeons and assistant surgeons."

The amendment is simply to allow the quartermasters and commissaries to be appointed by the President, and the surgeons and assistant surgeons to be selected by the States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. QUITMAN moved to reconsider the several votes by which the amendments were respectively concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL—CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution heretofore adopted, closing the debate on House bill No. 303 on Friday last, be rescinded; and that the debate in committee shall be extended to the rising of the committee on to-morrow; provided the debate shall be confined to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to move to postpone this debate until the information asked for in a resolution which I desire to propose shall have been received.

Mr. LETCHER. That has nothing to do with this bill. The gentleman can offer his resolution to-day; and if objection be made, he can move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the reception of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object. I think that five minutes' debate is better than the hour debate.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, because there are gentlemen on both sides of the House anxious to discuss this bill; and I regard it as important that they should have an opportunity of doing so, and that longer than five minutes should be allowed them.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. My objection is that, if the hour debate is extended, we will have three or four gentlemen consuming the whole day in discussing the merits of the bill generally; while under the five-minutes rule, debate will be confined to the particular point under consideration.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman will have the five-minutes debate in addition to the other; so that it ought to be much more satisfactory.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I move to suspend the rules.

The rules were suspended; and the resolution was received.

Mr. LETCHER moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia to limit the debate to twenty or thirty minutes. It seems to me that that will be more generally satisfactory than the hour debates.

Mr. LETCHER. I would have to get the rules suspended to get at that.

Mr. STANTON. Not at all.

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly I would.

Mr. STANTON. I submit that there is no difficulty in amending the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees no objection to offering any amendment that is germane to the resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, as it seems to be the desire of gentlemen to limit speeches to thirty minutes, I have no objection to offer that as an amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to the amendment; but I object to there being a rule adopted for the government of the House, which violates another rule that, I think, ought not to be violated. I do not object to thirty minutes. I think it is long enough.

Mr. SEWARD. I understood the previous question was asked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has the control of the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. One of the rules of the House is, that no member shall speak more than one hour. If an amendment be adopted limiting debate to thirty minutes, will that not be a change of the rules, and will it not require either a suspension of the rules, or unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It will require a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not object to the amendment; but I wish it to come in by unanimous consent, so that it shall not be considered as a precedent hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that a two-thirds vote will make it perfectly competent and in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The amendment can be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. Then take the vote on the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it in order to suspend the rules so as to admit the modification? The House evidently desire that there should be thirty minutes debate.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If the previous question is not seconded, will not the resolution then be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will modify his resolution so as to provide for thirty minutes debate.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection to the amendment being offered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move, then, to add to the resolution "and that no member shall be permitted to occupy more than thirty minutes in said debate."

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the rules have been suspended so as to enable the gentleman from North Carolina to offer this amendment?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House for consideration, and the Chair thinks the amendment is pertinent to the resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to learn if the House has the right to adopt this resolution, which changes the rules, without suspending the rules for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so decided.

Mr. SEWARD. It is clearly a change of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order; but it will require a two-thirds vote to adopt it.

Mr. LETCHER. I suppose, of course, this does not apply to the hour to which I am entitled to close the debate?

Mr. KEITT. I suppose it embraces all members. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled, under the rules, to an hour to make the closing speech; but if this resolution supersedes the rules, the gentleman will not be entitled to the whole hour.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will only operate upon the general debate.

Mr. LETCHER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the amendment, as I understand it will rescind the former order of the House. I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the resolution upon the table. If the rules of the House can be overridden—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I move to lay the resolution on the table. That is in order.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House adjourn. [Laughter.]

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as modified.

Mr. SEWARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does it require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. The resolution proposes a change of the rules, and it will require a two-thirds vote to adopt it.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, because I do not think that I can carry it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. LOVEJOY offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House, with the least possible delay, a full and minute statement of all contracts made in connection with the Utah expedition, the names of the persons with whom such contracts were made, and also the prices paid, or to be paid, for horses, mules, corn, and all other articles furnished for said expedition; the places where the horses, mules, &c., are to be delivered, and the prices to be paid for transportation of all such supplies; also designating what contracts, if any, were made without public notice or advertisement, and if advertised, in what mode, and at what places.

Mr. BURNETT obtained the floor.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is it in order to move the postponement of the further consideration of the deficiency bill until we obtain this information?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not on the floor to make the motion.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the propriety of suspending the printing of any books which may have been ordered by any previous Congress; and if the printing of any of said books has been commenced, that they inquire how far the work has progressed, and whether it is proper to discontinue their publication, and pay for the work which may have been done; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

The rules were suspended.

Mr. BURNETT. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BURNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

POLICE LAW FOR WASHINGTON.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, a resolution was adopted by this House instructing the Committee for the District of Columbia to inquire into the condition of the police of this city, with a view to ascertain its ability to protect the persons and property of citizens, and the committee at the same time were empowered to report at any time. The committee has discharged that duty. It has had the subject under consideration, and has arrived at the conclusion that the present police is utterly inadequate. It has agreed upon a report unanimously, and have instructed me to report to the House a bill to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the District of Columbia, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject.

Mr. Speaker, on the bill itself I have a very few words to say. While the general provisions of the bill command my approbation, I doubt whether the salaries fixed for the men of the police force are enough. I would be willing to pay them a higher salary. The bill contains appropriation necessary to carry its provisions into effect, and under the rules, the Speaker may deem it his duty to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, there to receive its first consideration. As its importance and urgency demand immediate action, I move that the rules be suspended, so that it may receive immediate action in the House.

The bill was read a first and second time, and is as follows:

A bill to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be established an auxiliary guard or watch for the protection of public and private property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief, at an annual salary of $2,000; one captain, at an annual salary of $1,200; four lieutenants, at an annual salary of $800 each; and one hundred men, at an annual salary of $600 each; to be paid monthly. The chief of the auxiliary guard shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the captain, lieutenants, and men, shall be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size; and the said chief is also authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of the said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, and to prescribe such arms for the use of the guard as they may deem necessary, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever in the judgment of the President of the United States the same may be required, he be, and is hereby, authorized to order such temporary increase of the guard as in his opinion may be expedient, not to exceed two hundred men, who shall be paid at the rate of two dollars per day while in service, and be dismissed so soon as, in the opinion of the President, their services may no longer be required.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge, and said uniforms, badges, and numbers hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; this section to take effect so soon as the chief shall report to the Secretary of the Interior that he has thirty men enrolled and ready for duty.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed $100,000, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GOODE. I hope that it will not be necessary to discuss the provisions of this bill. The circumstances of the times, the daily occurrence of murders and robberies in this city, imperiously demand that Congress shall take immediate and efficient action.

Mr. STANTON. What is the question before the House?

Mr. GOODE. I shall move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. As the bill contains an appropriation, it will be necessary that it shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless the rule upon that subject be suspended.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because I desire to offer an amendment providing that the police force shall be appointed by commissioners to be elected by the freeholders of this District. I want to disconnect it entirely from politics.

Mr. BURNETT. I call the gentleman to order. He has no right to discuss the proposition.

Mr. KELSEY. I merely wished to say, that I hope the bill will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that I may offer an amendment when it comes up.

Mr. GOODE. Of course, I shall be willing to allow time for any reasonable explanation and discussion; but I am not willing to discuss the propriety of the election of this force by the freeholders of the city of Washington.

Mr. STANTON. I want to know if there is a debatable question pending?

Mr. GOODE. Well, allow me to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the consideration of this bill in the House?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, Mr. STANTON, and Mr. KELSEY objected.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the rule requiring a bill containing an appropriation to be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be suspended.

Mr. STANTON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

[Cries of "Oh, no," and "let us try it without."]]

Mr. STANTON. Well, I withdraw the call.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I renew it. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes; I want the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bliss, Brocock, Bonham, Bowic, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B., Cochrane, John Cochrane, Corning, Cox, Jancos, Craig, Burton, Craig, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Carroll, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Tabbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Wintley, Winstlow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingsburg, Bingham, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Coffax, Comins, Covode, Crawford, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Durfee, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lench, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mur-ay, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Quitman, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—89.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rule was not suspended.

Mr. GOODE. I shall submit a motion which I hope will meet with the approbation of this House—on that side as well as upon this. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order of the day for Wednesday next, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. COLFAX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

Mr. GOODE. I wish to say to gentlemen that I hope, notwithstanding the vote which has just been taken, that in consideration of the absolute necessity of a police for this city, the House—gentlemen upon the other side as well as on this—will, by a two-thirds vote, make this bill a special order.

Mr. POTTLE. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that we are ready to act upon it to-day—at least I believe that to be the sentiment upon this side of the House. We desire that the bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may offer some amendments, but we are ready to act to-day.

Mr. GOODE. We cannot act on this bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to-day, because the deficiency bill is in the way. I will move, however, if that meets the views of gentlemen, that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I would inquire whether the bill has been printed?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. I want to see the bill.

Mr. COLFAX. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia. It must be evident to the gentleman that there are great objections to this bill, on this side of the House, and perhaps he can remove them by an answer. I would like to know whether he has any guarantee that this police force, if authorized by Congress, will be a non-partisan police—that is to say, that it will be selected from the best men, regardless of party considerations? We have a partisan police in this city now, and we want no more such; for human life is as unsafe here as it is in the Alps or the Apennines. Gentlemen upon this side of the House will coöperate with him in the establishment of a good and efficient police force.

Mr. GOODE. I cannot give the gentleman any guarantee on the subject. The police are to be appointed by the chief; and I can only say that it is not desired, by any party within my knowledge, that the force should be of a partisan character. The whole object is to provide an efficient police for the city. I disdain to bring party or religious considerations into the question.

Mr. BURNETT. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I desire to state to the gentleman from Indiana, that this bill was agreed on unanimously, as I understand, by the Committee for the District of Columbia, and that the object of that committee in reporting the bill was to give to the city of Washington an efficient police, without reference to anything like party.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why should the Government be called upon to pay the expenses?

Mr. BURNETT. The reason why we put a provision in the bill that Government should pay for it was—

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. What is the motion pending?

The SPEAKER. To refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Can that motion be entertained without a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The only other dispositions that can be made of it are, to recommit, to lay on the table, and to postpone.

Mr. LEITER. I would suggest to the friends of the bill that perhaps we had better agree on some time. I voted against the suspension of the rules, because we have not had time to consider the bill. It is such an important measure that I think we ought to act promptly. But I am unwilling to act on such an important measure inconsiderately—a measure which might bring on the country evils greater than those we are trying to provide against. I have not consulted any gentleman on this side of the House, but I would suggest that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and its consideration fixed for Wednesday next, and until disposed of.

Mr. GOODE. I agree to that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That cannot be done without a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. It requires a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I want to say to my colleague that general debate on the deficiency bill will terminate on Tuesday evening. The five minutes' debate then comes on, which will occupy all of Wednesday.

Mr. GOODE. Well, say Thursday. I wish to say, in all candor, to the gentleman from Ohio, that I have no wish to force this bill on the House without due consideration. I am very willing to have its consideration fixed for Wednesday or Thursday, with the understanding that it shall proceed from day to day until disposed of. But it is suggested that the deficiency bill will be under consideration on Wednesday. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio will be willing to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union now, when we will have an opportunity of considering, seriatim, the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LEITER. The bill is not printed; and, for one, I am unwilling to consider it until it is printed and before us.

Mr. GOODE. Very well; let it go till Wednesday.

Mr. LEITER. I would suggest further—although I know that the emergency is a great one—that we postpone this matter till an early day next week, when the deficiency bill will have been disposed of; and then let us consider it and perfect in such a manner as will make it effectual.

Mr. GOODE. How many murders will be perpetrated between this time and next week?

Mr. LEITER. Not more, on an average, than one and a half a day; and we can probably stand that till that time.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Since I have been a member of this House, we have been making appropriations for the police of this city; and the greatest performance that I ever knew them to do, was to catch negroes, or surprise them attending church at a late hour of the night. If they were told that there was a fugitive slave in the city, every one of them would be on the alert. I am opposed to making a special order for the protection of slavery within the District. If the bill restores to freedom the slaves held here, I will vote for it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am sorry for that.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object to any debate that is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in some doubt as to whether, pending a question to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the general merits of the question can be discussed. The Chair refers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] to the 133d rule, which directs that all proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole House. The Chair is of opinion that it would be, perhaps, straining the rule to allow the merits of the question to be discussed at this stage of the bill except the House had suspended the operation of the rule requiring it to be considered first in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I did not intend to discuss the question. I merely objected to its being made a special order.

Mr. KILGORE. I would suggest to the gentleman over the way that we might harmoniously agree to remove the capital of the nation to some place where the people will protect themselves without calling on the Government to take care of them. I will pledge myself that, if they locate the capital in my State, we will not call upon the Government to supply a police force to protect the citizens from the violence of ruffians. I suggest that, by way of compromise—

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I understand the pending motion to be to make this bill a special order for next Wednesday. I object to debate on that motion, as questions relating to priority of business must be put without debate.

Mr. DEAN. I move the previous question.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I desire to submit a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. STANTON. I submit that the gentleman from New York voted with the side that failed, and therefore cannot submit the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman had voted with the prevailing side, in the opinion of the Chair, he could have submitted the motion. The Chair doubts whether a motion to reconsider a vote refusing to suspend the rules could be made.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. And particularly after the bill has been received.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the motion, in the form in which it was made by the gentleman from Virginia, to make the bill a special order for Wednesday next, cannot be entertained, except by unanimous consent, or by a suspension of the rules, and that it will require a suspension of the rules to make this bill a special order after it has been referred, if the House chooses to refer it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question will then first be stated on the motion to refer, and the previous question will only apply to that motion. The gentleman from Virginia may then submit the motion to suspend the rules to make it a special order.

Mr. LETCHER. Will my colleague indulge me a moment to make some proposition by which this bill shall not interfere with the consideration of the deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER. The call for the previous question came from the other side of the House.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I propose to submit a motion to postpone the further consideration of the deficiency bill until we can get the information which we want.

Mr. LETCHER. We can get that by to-morrow morning.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. LEITER. I am not willing to stand by and see this bill sacrificed. I think we can come to some compromise.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object to debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is, that the House having refused to suspend the rules to consider the bill immediately; under the rule which provides that all bills making appropriations shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole House, the bill goes there of necessity, without a question.

The SPEAKER. The bill would go to the Speaker's table if no motion be made with reference to it. It might be recommitted, or postponed.

Mr. HOUSTON. If no motion be made, in the regular routine of business, I think it goes to a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. It would go, in the opinion of the Chair, to the Speaker's table.

Mr. FOSTER. Would it be in order to move to print it?

The SPEAKER. It would not at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 171; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brayton, Campbell, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, English, Granger, Harlan, Haskins, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Lovejoy, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Pettit, Potter, Quitman, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Waldron, and Elihu B. Washburne—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Casr, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glaucy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Kelsey, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, MacIay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miller, Milson, Moore, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tripp, Underwood, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—171.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The bill was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOODE. I now desire to offer this resolution, connected with the vote which has just been taken. Every member of this House is desirous of having an efficient police for the city of Washington, at as early a day as possible. I ask the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill of the House, providing for the establishment of an auxiliary guard in the city of Washington, be made a special order, to take effect as soon as the deficiency bill, now pending, is disposed of, and shall so continue from day to day, until finally disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. GOODE. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. STANTON. Is it in order to fix a special order for a time when another question is disposed of, without fixing a particular day?

The SPEAKER. The time to make objections as to the particular form of the resolution will be when the resolution comes up for consideration. The Chair will, however, indicate to the gentleman from Ohio that, in his opinion, the phraseology of the resolution is in conformity to the rules of the House. It fixes a specific and definite time when the special order shall commence; at a time, namely, when a particular bill now pending in committee shall be disposed of.

Mr. STANTON. Will the special order commence as soon as the deficiency bill is disposed of in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; or must the deficiency bill go to the House first?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order in the committee as soon as the deficiency bill is disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were not ordered—ayes 24, noes 154.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The rules were then suspended—ayes 123, noes 40.

Mr. GOODE demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOODE. Everybody seems desirous that this bill shall be scrutinized; and that every member may have a copy, I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CENSUS OF 1860.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Chair, to continue during this Congress, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the best mode of taking the census of 1860, with leave to report by bill or otherwise, during the session of Congress commencing on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. KEITT. I object to the resolution, simply because it is provided for by law.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The present law is defective, and admitted to be so on all hands. I move to suspend the rules.

The rules were not suspended; there being, on a division—ayes 103, noes 80.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

Mr. SICKLES presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in relation to officers of the revolutionary army; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

STENOGRAPHER FOR SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, the committee on the Wilkins's Point investigation, have directed me to report the following resolution to the House:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to investigate the facts and circumstances connected with the sale and purchase at Wilkins's Point, New York, by the Government, for fortification purposes, in the year 1857, be authorized to employ a stenographer at the usual compensation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood, when this committee was appointed, that the intention was not to examine more than three witnesses.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman is altogether mistaken. That was the committee to investigate certain charges in reference to the purchase of the Pennsylvania bank building for a court-house, &c. On this Wilkins's Point committee it is found impossible to get along without a stenographer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has this committee a right to report at any time?

Mr. FLORENCE. The resolution is in.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that you have a stenographer.

Mr. FLORENCE. We have; and now we want to pay him. We go on the rule that the laborer is worthy of his hire.

The SPEAKER. If there be objection the resolution cannot come in.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The committee have employed a stenographer without authority.

Mr. FLORENCE. The thing is all fair; and to give gentlemen time to see its justice, I move the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 6, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information as to the condition of the United States ship Franklin; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SEWARD, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Canajoharie, New York, praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law, for the relief of insolvent debtors; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Livingston county, New York, for the enactment of a law granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and the widows of those deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Seneca county, New York, praying that pensions may be granted to the soldiers of the war of 1812 who served from three to eighteen months; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Henry R. Schoolcraft, late acting superintendent of Indian affairs in Michigan, praying to be allowed a commission on disbursements; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FOOT presented four petitions of inhabitants of Vermont for the establishment of a mail route from Castleton to Sudbury, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. IVERSON presented the memorial of William M. Varnum, agent of the State of Georgia, praying that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to ascertain and pay the amount due to that State for money advanced in the suppression of Indian hostilities; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BIGLER presented a memorial of Amos Kendall, supplemental to the memorial of the Magnetic and New England Union Telegraph Companies; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and a motion by Mr. BIGLER to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Hezekiah Miller, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Noah Smith, reported a bill (S. No. 240) for the relief of Noah Smith, late a private in the Army of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. STUART. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a privileged question, which I think is important in its character, not only in the present instance, but as a precedent for the action of the officers of the Senate. On inquiry, I learn that the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, although acted upon definitely by this body on Friday of last week, is still in possession of the Senate; that it is retained here upon the motion of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] stating that he reserves his right to move to reconsider the vote. Now, sir, the right—I speak of a strict right—in such a question, in my judgment, is simply this: it is the right of a Senator to move a reconsideration within two succeeding days of actual session after the vote is taken. The rule, however, puts another limitation. The motion must be made within two days; but the rule fixes also another limitation, which is, that no motion to reconsider shall be made after the bill or paper has gone out of the possession of the Senate. But this gives no right to retain a bill here at the request or suggestion of a single Senator.

There has been a courtesy of the Senate, and I think a very proper one, which, upon a suggestion to the Presiding Officer, has authorized the retention of a bill until a Senator could have an opportunity in actual session to make his motion to reconsider. But if the Senate now adopts the idea that, upon the suggestion of a Senator, any bill can be retained here for two days after it is acted upon, then it is in the power of any Senator to defeat any measure which passes the Senate within two days of the end of a session. If he voted in the affirmative, and says to the officer, "I reserve my right to move to reconsider, and I insist that that right lasts for two days," he can defeat a measure and you have no way to prevent it. The rules must, as a matter of course, be constructed connectedly—connectedly with the business of the Senate. The order of the Senate in every case, on the passage of a bill, is that the Secretary communicate the bill to the House of Representatives, when it is finally acted upon. That is the order of the Senate. Now there is no rule—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. This subject is evidently occupying the time that should be devoted to the business of the morning hour; besides, I have never seen the Senate more empty than it is now, and I ask whether it is in order to proceed with this matter, and cut off the presentation of petitions, the submission of reports, and morning business generally? I do not think it is in order, and I raise the question.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that this question can probably be disposed of at once. If it should be likely to lead to any argument or controversy, or if there is any difficulty in it, it can be postponed.

Mr. STUART. I desire the Chair to settle the question of order; for, if I am in order, I wish to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Michigan to raise a privileged question.

Mr. STUART. To insist that the order of the Senate be executed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regards the Senator from Michigan as strictly in order.

Mr. STUART. Now, sir, I will complete my statement. The results I have pointed out would inevitably follow if any Senator had a right to retain a measure here for two legislative days after it was passed upon. I said that he had no such right; that his right was simply to move to reconsider; and that the Senate having ordered the communication to be sent to the House of Representatives, that order must be executed, unless there be some rule to prevent it. If there is any rule which authorizes the Presiding Officer of the Senate, or the Secretary of the Senate, or any other officer, to retain a measure here which has been acted upon by the Senate, then the rule can be produced.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I did not exactly understand the honorable Senator's statement. He stated that this bill was retained here on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana. Does he mean to say that the Senator from Louisiana made a motion in the Senate?

Mr. STUART. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. SLIDELL. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I will state exactly what I have done in this matter, and the reasons upon which I have based my action. For reasons satisfactory to myself I choose, if I have the privilege of exercising it, to retain this bill here to-day. I conceive that I have the right to do so under the express provisions of the rules of the Senate. On Friday last—

Mr. STUART. I shall have to yield the floor, I suppose.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am willing that the gentleman shall proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought the Senator from Michigan had yielded the floor.

Mr. SLIDELL. I thought it would facilitate matters, if I stated how the case stood. I have certainly no disposition to interfere with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. Go on, sir.

Mr. SLIDELL. No, sir. I will hold the floor by the indulgence of no one. If you have anything to say, I will wait and respond.

Mr. STUART. Well, Mr. President, there is no necessity for any feeling on this subject whatever.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no feeling. You have shown it, I think.

Mr. STUART. I have no desire to present anything here except what I conceive to be very important, and I have stated it with a view to that, to be the settled action and precedent of the Senate. If the Senate is disposed to settle a course of action which gives me the power to prevent a measure from becoming a law that has passed within the last two days of a Congress, I shall have no more reason to complain than any other man here; but I submit that it is not a power which can be safely intrusted to anybody.

I was saying, sir, that the courtesy of the Senate, which I thought was a proper courtesy, had been exercised through its presiding officers thus far: when a Senator notified the Presiding Officer or the Secretary that he designed to make a motion to reconsider, and wished the bill held back until he could have the opportunity to do so, that courtesy has been extended. Otherwise, the rule applying that the motion is not in order after the bill has passed from the possession of the Senate, he would be cut off unless a majority of the Senate chose to ask that it be returned from the other House. There is a conclusive reason, therefore, why he should have the opportunity to make a motion for reconsideration. But when a Senator has had the opportunity and declines to avail himself of it, but claims it as a right to keep a bill here for two days after it has passed, I submit that it will not be safe for the business of the Senate and the country to adopt such a course of proceeding. It is, in my judgment, in clear violation of the rules of the Senate, and of the duty of its officers; and it was therefore that I rose to ask that the order of the Senate, made on Friday, that this bill should be communicated to the House of Representatives, be executed. I thought it a very proper occasion to bring to the attention of the Senate the difficulty that we should be in if we adopted a principle which would put the control of the business of the Senate into the hands of any one Senator.

I did not rise for the purpose of complaining of the Senator from Louisiana. He may exercise any rights that he thinks he possesses here, and I certainly will treat him with all the respect that is due to a Senator, and to him individually; but it is the business of the Senate which will be jeopardized, if the Senate adopts or allows this practice. My motion, therefore, is, that the order of the Senate, made on Friday last in reference to the Kansas bill, be executed at once.

Mr. SLIDELL. Mr. President, I was about to state the reason for my action in this case, and was about to appeal to the rule as fully sustaining me in the course that I have thought proper to adopt. The rule governing this matter appears to me to be free from all ambiguity. It is the 20th rule of the Senate. It provides that "When a question has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof; but no motion for the reconsideration of any vote shall be in order after a bill, resolution, message, report, amendment, or motion, upon which the vote was taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate, announcing their decision."

I believe this bill is still in the possession of the Senate; and, with all due deference to the Senator from Michigan, I deny that any order has been made by the Senate, directing this bill to be carried to the House of Representatives. It is very possible that on the Journal such an order may appear as having been made; but I take it for granted that the Senate never makes an order unless upon the motion of some Senator. Now, I have not looked at the Journal, but I have had occasion, once or twice, to observe that the Senate is said to have directed a bill to be sent to the House of Representatives, when, to my knowledge, no such order has been given. I assume that no such order has been given in this case. If the contrary appears on the Journal, it is an act of supererogation on the part of the clerk, without any authority from the Senate.

Then the bill being still in the possession of the Senate, what are my rights? The rule goes on to say:

"Nor shall any motion for reconsideration be in order, unless made on the same day on which the vote was taken, or within the two next days of actual session of the Senate thereafter."

That is a direct concession of the right, at any time within two days of actual session of the Senate after a bill has passed, to move for a reconsideration. Now, sir, I do not feel myself bound to give my reasons for the action that I choose to take in this matter. They are satisfactory to myself. As a Senator I have the right, I believe, subject always to the control of the appellate power of the Senate. I do not consider this, in any sense, a privileged question. It is in the power of any member of the majority, was on Friday, was yesterday, is at this moment, in the power of any member of the Senate who voted in the majority on this occasion, to move a reconsideration. The moment that motion is made it is a privileged question, and the Senate can entertain it. If the Senator from Michigan can find any Senator who voted with the majority, that is disposed now to make this motion, he has a very simple mode of bringing the question of privilege before the Senate. But, in the mean while, I deny that the Senate has any right to act on this matter. I say that my discretion in this matter cannot be controlled by the action of the Senate; that I have the right, until the close of this legislative day, to move a reconsideration. Whether I do so or not will depend upon circumstances which may occur in the course of the day; I may or may not.

As to the argument of inconvenience, it is very true; and I can see all the difficulties that might result from the application of this rule at a late period of the session. That may be a very good reason for amending the rule; but until the rule be amended, it appears to me that my right is positive, and cannot be controlled by any action of the Senate, and I am not disposed to yield it. If the Senator from Michigan can satisfy me that my construction of the rule is a bad one, or rather can satisfy the majority of the Senate that such is the case, of course I must yield; but believing that I possess the right, I intend to exercise it.

Mr. STUART. I think the error into which the Senator has fallen is upon the construction of the rule. The rule has, as I said, two limitations upon the right to move a reconsideration. The first one is, that it must be done while the bill or paper is in the possession of the Senate; the next one is, that in any event it must be done within two days of actual session after the bill has passed. These are limitations upon the right to move a reconsideration. Now, sir, the right to retain a bill, in order to make a motion to reconsider, is a right that has no existence at all. It is not found in the rule. I grant that when a Senator makes his motion to reconsider, the bill being in possession of the Senate, it must be retained; and why? Because that is a motion he has a right to make; nobody can deprive him of it; and the bill still being within the possession of the Senate, no inconvenience grows out of that right, because the Senate, by a majority, can dispose of the motion. No delay can arise in that case, for it is a privileged question, and the Senate may take it right up and act upon it, and reconsider or refuse to reconsider at once. Then no inconvenience grows out of it at all.

But, sir, if you adopt the argument that because a single Senator has a right to move to reconsider, he therefore has a right to retain a bill, and in the end not make his motion to reconsider, you do most emphatically put the whole business of the Senate within the power of a single Senator. You put it, in all stages of the session, within his power for two succeeding legislative days after any bill is passed; and at the close of the session you put the whole business itself into his hands.

Now, Mr. President, let me test this idea: and I test it not for the purpose of moving to amend the rules, for they need no amendment; I will show you, I think, that they need no amendment. Suppose this to be the last day of the session, and the Senate now passes an appropriation bill; I vote for it, and immediately send a note to the Secretary or Presiding Officer that I reserve my right to move a reconsideration within two days, and demand that that bill be kept here: if the right exists now in this case, how are you going to prevent it then?

Mr. SLIDELL. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to state to him how it can be prevented easily?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. SLIDELL. It can be prevented by any other member of the majority asking for a reconsideration. That is a complete answer to any danger that might result from a mere factious spirit on the part of a single member. There are more than thirty members of the Senate who voted for this bill. If any one of them can be found to move a reconsideration, very well.

Mr. STUART. With all respect to the Senator, I think that is not an answer; because, not only the minority of the Senate, but the country, has a right to have the action of Congress proceed uninterruptedly. It does not follow that because in a given case there might be a majority of the Senate voting for a measure, it can be thus withheld—not at all. The Senator is not talking about what may possibly be done; he is talking about his right. He says he has this right. That is the position that I am controverting. As I said, let him make his motion. That exercises his right, and that puts it in the power of the Senate to dispose of it; to reconsider, or to refuse to reconsider. Then he enjoys his right, and he enjoys it in consonance with the rights of every other member of the body, and the body itself, and with the business of the country. But, when he neither makes his motion nor permits the bill to go to the House of Representatives, the right which he claims places under foot the rights of the country; it places under foot the rights of men who voted against the bill; and it is suggested that all difficulty may be avoided by seeking for some member, who votes in the majority, who will move to reconsider at once, and have that motion disposed of immediately. Why, sir, what sort of business would it be for a man who wanted a bill passed, to go looking around among the majority to see if he could not find some one who would condescend to make this motion! That is not the question. As I said, the rules need no amendment. The right to reconsider is perfectly consonant with the right of the Senate to act. Let the motion be made; let the Senate say whether they will dispose of it now, or to-morrow, or at any time—whether they will reconsider or not. That leaves the Senate in full and complete control of its own business; but if you adopt the ground contended for by the Senator from Louisiana, the business of the Senate is in the possession of a single individual.

There is nothing in the rules which authorizes an officer to retain a bill at all. The rules do not say that, on notice of a motion to reconsider, a measure shall be retained; but it is sought to show that the limitations imposed by the rule upon the right to move a reconsideration, limiting it in the first place to the fact that the measure is still in the possession of the Senate, and in the next place to two succeeding legislative days in time, are, in fact, an extension of the right. Why, sir, they are limitations upon the right; and although the motion to reconsider may be made within two days, if the measure shall have gone from the Senate the right no longer exists, unless the Senate see fit, by courtesy, as they usually do, to ask that the bill be returned.

I think, with all respect, if the Senator desires to reconsider, let him make his motion. Then it will be in the possession of the Senate, and we can dispose of it. But if he does not desire to reconsider, let the bill take the usual course. He does not tell the Senate whether he desires to reconsider or not; he simply says that for reasons satisfactory to himself, he wishes this bill kept here to-day, and thinks he has a right to keep it. I say that it is not according to our rules; it is not a safe proceeding to establish in the business of the Senate; and it is one of those things which certainly will come back to plague the inventors—I mean the Senate of the United States. If we agree to it we shall find ourselves obliged hereafter to lose important measures, or to disavow the precedent that is claimed to-day. If I am understood, Mr. President, it is all I desire. I say that the rules give no authority to retain a bill at all; that power cannot be found in the rules; and the exceptions in the 20th rule are limitations on the right to move a reconsideration.

The Senator from Louisiana says there has been no order of the Senate directing this bill to be sent to the House of Representatives. I say there has been such an order. Would anybody undertake to say in court that, because an order made is one within that list which are orders as a matter of course, it is not the order of the court? I have no doubt that the strict practice would be to move that the Secretary communicate this bill to the House of Representatives; but it is one of those orders which, in long parliamentary usage here, has grown up as a matter of course; but it is no less the order of the Senate. It would be exceedingly inconvenient to require that a Senator should rise every time a bill was passed and move this order. It has come to be a settled custom. It is a motion, of course, when a bill is passed, and it is in accordance with the 46th rule of the Senate, which makes it the duty of the Secretary to communicate these messages to the House of Representatives. He must do it.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him what is the question now before the Senate? I have just come in.

Mr. STUART. The question is this: The Senate, on Friday last, refused to concur in the House amendment to the Kansas bill. The Senator from Louisiana, on the next day, filed with the Clerk a notice in writing that he wished to reserve his right to move to reconsider that vote. Yesterday he renewed it verbally; and to-day he renews it again. My proposition is, that the officers of the Senate be directed to execute the order made on Friday, and communicate the action of the Senate to the House of Representatives; and I contend that the Senator has not a right to retain the bill on his mere suggestion.

I had only a word more to say. The Senator from Louisiana does not, this morning, say that he designs to move a reconsideration. It is, therefore, only using this alleged right to delay a bill in its passage between the two Houses. He had the opportunity yesterday, he has it to-day, to move to reconsider. That is a right that I would be the last man in the least degree to limit beyond the rules. I would construe the rules liberally to afford the opportunity to make the motion; but the opportunity being had, I deny that it is in the power of a single Senator to say that the bill shall stay here to the end of the time limited, and after all he will not make the motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I differ somewhat from the views of the honorable Senator from Michigan in his construction of this rule of order. It is certainly meant (whether imposed in the form of a restriction or not is immaterial) to give a right to reconsider a bill on the day on which it passes, and within the next two days on which the Senate is in session. According to my recollection, the practice is this: when notice is not given to the Secretary of any probable intention to move for a reconsideration, as soon as the bill is engrossed, it is sent to the other House in the ordinary course of business. If, however, notice is given to the Secretary, I have known many cases, I think, in which, as a matter of course, he retains a bill with a view to let the Senator who gives the notice to move to reconsider, if he sees fit. It does not require any positive enunciation that the party will move to reconsider, for the object is to give time and opportunity to any Senator who votes for a bill to move to reconsider within a limited time, a time not unreasonable.

Now, sir, to apply that rule in its fullest latitude to the end of the session would be unreasonable; and I do not say that it is obligatory on the officer in any case to retain a bill; because, even if he communicates it to the House of Representatives, if the motion to reconsider is made before it has passed the House, the Senate has frequently sent a message to the House, asking for the return of the bill, in order to allow a motion for reconsideration to be made. The practice, then, it seems to me, must be in the discretion of the officer. At the close of the session, when it would obstruct public business, the officer naturally would reply to a Senator, "The bill is engrossed, and ready to go to the House of Representatives. There will be no time to act on it if I delay it, and I feel it my duty to communicate it at once, unless some order of the Senate is made to the contrary." But, in this case, I can see no reason for refusing the right of the Senator; and it would be ungracious in the Clerk to refuse when there is no press of business, and a Senator says to him, "I desire to move to reconsider that bill, and I desire to retain it for the length of time within which I may make that motion." I do not think it requires any action, unless the Senate should be of opinion (and I do not deny the right of the Senator from Michigan to make the motion) that the bill ought to go at once to the House of Representatives, or that there is some public exigency requiring that the bill shall not be retained here for the lapse of three days. Then the Senate certainly have the power to direct it to be communicated.

It seems to me that this construction of the rule would make it work fairly all around. Any Senator can ask the Secretary to retain a bill if he thinks it probable that he will move to reconsider. If any other Senator thinks that will interfere with the public business, the bill not having been communicated, he may make a motion to the Senate; and it is in the power of the Senate to say whether the bill shall go to the House at once. That is the view I take of the rule. I think it would be the most courteous and best construction for the public business.

I know of no reason why this bill should be sent to the House of Representatives earlier than the time within which a Senator may move for a reconsideration. If there be such a reason, and it is given, I should be perfectly willing to vote, if the honorable Senator from Louisiana did not withdraw his request, that the bill should be communicated to the House of Representatives; but I see no necessity for any difficulty under the rule. I take it for granted that the bill would be communicated at once, unless some request was made by a Senator to retain it. If that request was made under circumstances that would obstruct the public business, the Secretary would have a right to refuse, and might send it at once. It is a matter left to his discretion within that time. Then if a Senator moves to reconsider, and asks the Senate to recall the bill, they may consider whether they will recall it. On the other hand, there is no breach of duty, no impropriety, on the part of the Clerk, at the request of any Senator who voted for a bill, in retaining it for that period of time within which the reconsideration may be moved. But when the question is presented to the Senate, if there are any circumstances requiring that it should go within that period of time, it is for the majority of the Senate to say whether that ought to be done or not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This question becomes important, inasmuch as the Senator from Louisiana claims, as a right, that he can retain the bill for three days. If it was only a question of courtesy, it would be very different; but when a single member asserts his right to detain a bill in this body after the Senate has disposed of it and directed it to be sent to the House of Representatives, it becomes a very grave and serious question, as affecting the business of the Senate. I desire the Clerk, as there has been a question about what the order was, to read the order in the Journal upon this case in regard to sending the bill to the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read from the Journal of Friday; which states, that when the Senate disagreed to the House amendment to the Kansas bill, it was "Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly."

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and directed the Secretary so to notify the House. This was clearly an order that our action should be communicated to the House of Representatives. Now the question is, can a single Senator defeat the execution of that order for any length of time, or for the time claimed, which is three days after the passage of a bill? My understanding is, that it is an imperative order on the Secretary to proceed immediately to notify the House of Representatives of our action, and that the Secretary has no right to delay it at my request, or the request of any other Senator in the body.

Mr. BAYARD. It has been repeatedly done.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is no answer to say that it has been repeatedly done, as is suggested by the Senator from Delaware. I suppose it has been done to this extent, and this only: that where a Senator had voted for a bill, and came to the conclusion that he was probably mistaken in his vote, and desired to reverse his action, the Secretary has kept the bill back until the next meeting of the Senate, to give him an opportunity to move a reconsideration. The Senator from Louisiana says perhaps that is his case. I trust, for his own reputation and the good of the country, that it is so. When a Senator comes to the conclusion that he has voted wrong, he ought to have the opportunity to enter a motion to reconsider. When a bill passes, and the Senate adjourns immediately, he may go at once to the Clerk and say: "I desire to enter a motion to reconsider, and I would like you to wait until one o'clock to-morrow;" and I suppose the Clerk would feel authorized to wait that long, simply that he might have an opportunity of introducing his motion. But when he comes in the next morning, and withholds the motion, refuses to make it, perseveres in that refusal during that day and another day, and comes the third day and will not make his motion, has he a right, without even saying that he is going to make it, to withhold the bill from the House of Representatives, in defiance of the order of the Senate? I think not. But if the Senator from Louisiana be right in saying that it is his right, under the rule, to enter the motion to reconsider at any time within three days, on the day of the passage of a bill, or within two days thereafter, then it is clear that the Clerk has no right to send the bill to the House of Representatives until after the three days expire. If it is the right of any member voting in the majority to make the motion, no written request is necessary. The written notice of the Senator from Louisiana to the Clerk does not give him any more right or power over this bill than he would have had if he had not made it. He cannot discharge the Secretary from his obligation to perform his duty under the law and the rules, by carrying out the order of the Senate. His note does not confer any additional authority on the Secretary; does not modify the Secretary's duty. If it was the duty of the Secretary to send the bill without that note, it is his duty to send it after receiving the note. If under that note the Secretary had no right to send the bill to the House, he had no right to send it without the note being sent. A direction from an individual Senator cannot control the action of the body.

I therefore respectfully insist that no one member of this body can discharge the Clerk from the obligation to perform his duty under the rule. The order is on the Journal that he shall notify the House of Representatives of our action in this case. I know that the Senator from Louisiana denies that the Senate has directed such an order to be made. If it be true, as he insists, that the Senate has not made any such order as the Secretary has entered on the Journal, then it is his imperative duty to move that the Journal be amended, that an erroneous entry shall not remain; that an untrue order shall not be recorded upon it; and it is the imperative duty of the Senate to amend the Journal and strike out that order if the Senate have not made the order. But if you go through the history of the Government, I apprehend you will find such an order in every instance where the Senate has, by a vote, disagreed to an amendment of the House of Representatives to a Senate bill, or has passed a bill. The order is a parliamentary legal consequence of the vote.

Mr. BAYARD. What is the order, I ask?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That the Secretary be directed to request the concurrence of the House in our action.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the honorable Senator if that does not allow a reasonable discretion to the officer to retain it at the request of a Senator, unless the Senate order to the contrary?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Clearly not; because the Senate having made its order already, and that being entered on the Journal, that is the law to the Secretary, which he has no right to violate.

Mr. GREEN. I call for the special order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour for the special order having arrived, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill to admit Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall waive my right, so as to go on with the Minnesota bill. I suppose the gentlemen have accomplished their object; but still it becomes an important question as a matter of law.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to introduce a resolution, which I hope will lead to no discussion. It is in relation to the report of the Committee on Printing. The resolution is not one that casts any reflection on them, but it is offered with a view to have it adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If this resolution leads to debate, I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it leads to any debate, of course it will be postponed. The resolution is:

Resolved, That there be printed, in pamphlet form, for the use of the Senate, ten thousand copies of the addresses made by the members of the Senate, and members of the House of Representatives, upon the occasions of the death of the Hon. A. P. Butler, of South Carolina; Hon. James Bell, of New Hampshire; and Hon. Thomas J. Rusk, of Texas, late Senators of the United States; and that the Printer to the Senate be directed to prepare them in a similar manner to the eulogies on the life of Hon. John M. Clayton.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I must make a statement in regard to the resolution—a very short one—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not feel authorized to waive the special order—the Minnesota bill—under the circumstances.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I give notice that I shall call up the resolution to-morrow during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules require a resolution to lie over one day, if objected to. This resolution, therefore, must lie over.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call for the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As connected with the matter which has been under discussion this morning in the Senate, the Chair deems it proper to throw himself on the indulgence of the Senate, in order to make a brief statement in relation to his own conduct, as well as that of the Clerk. I am very frank to say that when the subject was brought to the notice of the Chair, it seemed to him to present a question somewhat novel in its character, and not free from embarrassment. The Clerk notified me of the notice he had received, and in fact showed me the note of the Senator from Louisiana, and seemed to invoke my direction as the Presiding Officer more than in any other form. I stated to him that the question was new to me, and that I was not conversant with the practice in matters of this kind, and asked him to state to me what was the practice in such cases, as he had been long in the Senate, and intimately conversant with subjects of this character.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the President be good enough to raise his voice a little?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I was stating that when the matter was brought to my notice, I was disposed to seek the aid and advice of those more conversant with the rules and practice of the Senate than myself; and I knew of none more familiar with them than the clerk. He stated to me that in cases where an intimation had been given by a Senator that a bill should not be sent to the House of Representatives in order to allow him to move a reconsideration, the practice had been uniform to regard the wishes of the Senator. I told him, then, that the safe rule was to refer to the rules of the Senate; and on looking into the rules, I found, what has been read by the Senator from Louisiana, a provision granting to any Senator the right, within two days of actual session subsequent to the passage of a bill, to move a reconsideration. All will concede that the Senator has a right until the close of this day to move to reconsider the vote disagreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives to this bill. If, however, the bill had been sent to the House of Representatives in conformity with the general usage of the Senate, without the interposition of the Senator from Louisiana, his right would have been forfeited. While the bill remained here, however, he had the right, and has now, to move to reconsider before the lapse of the two days.

Believing, from the general courtesy of the Senate, that they would not willingly order a bill to be sent from this body when any Senator wanted to avail himself of that right; believing that they would extend it to him as a courtesy, if not, perhaps, as a right, I told the Clerk to withhold the bill. All the responsibility, then, of withholding the bill, I say to the Senate, attaches to me more than to the Clerk, because he acted under my advice and direction. Believing that the established uniform courtesy of the Senate would tolerate a proceeding of that kind, and without attempting to determine the strict rule, I was disposed to withhold the bill until the Senate determined otherwise. I have deemed it proper to make this statement that it may go out as a part of the history of this transaction.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Had I supposed it was asked as a matter of courtesy, for the purpose of making a motion to reconsider, I should not have made the slightest objection; but the Senator from Louisiana asserts his right to keep the bill here three days, without giving the assurance that he intends, at any time, to move a reconsideration. It is not that he desires to reconsider it. He does not say that he wishes to reconsider it; he refuses now to intimate that he desires to reconsider; but he desires, for reasons satisfactory to himself, to keep the bill three days in this body, without putting himself under the obligation to move a reconsideration. I could not agree, as a matter of courtesy, to let him keep it here three days for his own purposes, when he did not wish to reconsider; but if he said to me that he did desire to reconsider, I would grant the request on the instant. It is the question of right, and not the question of courtesy, that I was discussing. But I now ask for the special order.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Chair will allow me to say that I think the order he made in this case is in accordance with all the past usages of this body. The only error the Senator from Louisiana committed, if it be an error, was filing a notice with the Clerk. It has been the uniform practice here, when a Senator voting with the majority desired to reconsider, or thought it possible that he might at a subsequent day, within the period named in the 20th rule, move a reconsideration, to suggest that fact to the Chair, and the Chair uniformly has given the order to the Secretary to suspend action until the limitation expired. I think the order of the Chair was in accordance with past practice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Knowing the Senator from Indiana to have been an old Presiding Officer, I designed to have a conversation with him on the subject, but I had not time on that day—in fact he was not in the Senate; and he did not come in time to enable me to confer with him this morning.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. As to the usage of the Senate, I have some little knowledge. Heretofore, when a question had been decided, and an adjournment immediately took place, without any opportunity of moving for a reconsideration, I have myself gone and asked the Clerk, "hold this, sir, if you please, until to-morrow morning, the earliest time at which I can make a motion to reconsider," and it has been acceded to. But I applied for it as an act of courtesy, and it was granted to me as an act of courtesy; and there has never been any other practice here that I ever heard of. It has never been supposed that a gentleman, by a note to the Clerk, can peremptorily require that a bill shall remain here two days to give time to consider whether a motion for reconsideration shall be made, and it is for the Senate to consider whether they will put their proceedings so under the control of any Senator. I think it would be very injurious to do so. I never heard before, long as I have been here, of any member assuming the right to retain a bill for two days, upon his mere rescript to the Clerk that he required it for consideration. If such proceedings have taken place they have been unknown to me, and, so far as I know, totally unknown to the Senate—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. If the special order is to be proceeded with, I desire this discussion to stop.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I submit whether debate on this question is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The remarks of the Chair, as well as the remarks of Senators, since one o'clock, were not strictly in order, but were made by the courtesy of the Senate. There is no question before the body.

Mr. HALE, and others. There is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair threw himself on the indulgence of the Senate, and I presume the same indulgence will be extended to other Senators if the debate is not extended to any length of time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I thought you were suggesting that you had made inquiries, and left the subject open to inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was done by the indulgence of the Senate when there was no question before it.

Mr. SEWARD and Mr. HALE. There is a question.

Mr. STUART. I think the Chair—

Mr. IVERSON. I call for the special order.

Mr. STUART. I was going to state that I think this question is before the Senate. This is a privileged question, which overrides the special order, unless the Senate vote it away. A privileged question may be taken up at any time when there is no other business before the Senate at that time; and being a privileged question, it overrides the special order, unless the Senate now lay it aside for the special order.

Mr. SEWARD. State what your motion was.

Mr. STUART. My motion was that the Secretary be directed to carry out now the order of Friday, and communicate this message to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am sorry to differ in my recollection with the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Michigan, I feel very confident, made no motion of any sort.

Mr. STUART. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SLIDELL. He simply called the attention of the Chair to what he considered a gross irregularity.

Mr. STUART. I beg pardon of the Senator. I certainly did make a motion, and presented it distinctly. I made it repeatedly and distinctly.

Mr. SLIDELL. Was it a motion to send the bill to the other House?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir; that the Clerk be directed now to execute the order.

Mr. SLIDELL. I was mistaken, then, as to the fact. Then the question recurs whether this is a question of privilege; and I would say to the Senator from Illinois, who has been so extremely anxious—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the views taken by the Senators, the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have nothing more to say but to bear the evidence of my experience here. I never before heard even the claim made, much less the allowance of such a claim as is now made by the Senator from Louisiana, that he has a right, by his mere ipse dixit to the Clerk, to paralyze the action of the Senate for two days. I never heard the claim made, much less allowed, before.

Mr. SEWARD. I think it important that we should understand this subject before it passes away from us now; but I do not see any very great difficulty in arriving at a correct conclusion with regard to the practice which ought to prevail, and which is contemplated by the rules. A reconsideration may be of a measure which would still remain in the Senate after the decision of the Senate upon it. The action may not be final; the judgment given may not be final. It is not therefore transmitted either to the House of Representatives or to the President of the United States. Such a matter may remain for two days within the Senate, or for two months, or forever. The rule contemplates, then, the reconsideration of such interlocutory questions; but the same rule provides for the reconsideration of questions which may pass immediately, by order of the Senate, beyond the control of the Senate; that is, the final vote; and so, gathering and grooving the two subjects into one, the rule provides for the two cases, and at the same time fixes the limitations subject to which the motion to reconsider shall be made and take effect.

Now, I suppose that no motion for reconsideration can be offered or requested by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, or by any other Senator, within two days, if, during that time, by another order of the Senate, the matter is sent beyond its control. The honorable Senator from Louisiana thinks that no such order has, in fact, been made; and he asserts his right upon the ground that although the Journal shows such an order directing this bill to be carried to the House of Representatives, yet that the order has not, in fact, been made. I think the honorable Senator will come to the conclusion, on reflection, that he is erroneous in this view. The parliamentary law determines what shall be the effect of the votes on which a division is made. The vote in this case was that the Senate do not concur with the House of Representatives in their amendment. The Clerk embodies the sense of the Senate, thus expressed, in parliamentary language:

Resolved, That the Senate do not agree to the amendments; and

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate the fact to the House of Representatives.

That this is a solemn order of the Senate, just as effective as if it were made in so many words and assented to in so many words, will be obvious from the fact that it is the manner in which every such vote has always been expressed from the beginning of the Government, and that if such a vote has not, in fact, passed, then this bill can never go to the House of Representatives, even after the three days have expired, unless an actual order of the Senate, for that purpose, shall be made. I think, therefore, that the Senator from Louisiana is erroneous in supposing that such an order has not been made, as the Journal asserts has been made.

Now, in regard to the execution of that order, I think it is clear that when an order of the Senate is made directly to the Secretary to perform a duty, the effect of the order, the meaning, the sense, the will of the Senate, is that it shall be done immediately. That it is not to be done at a future day, is clear. It must be intended to be done at a future day or done now. If it is not to be done now, and not to be done at a future day, then it is to be done at the discretion of the Secretary; and who supposes that the Senate of the United States ever reposes in the Secretary, a ministerial officer, a discretion so important as that of deciding when he will communicate to the President of the United States, or to the House of Representatives, the will of this coordinate branch of the Legislature? It is, therefore, to be done immediately.

Then the question is whether one Senator has any right—I do not speak of things of courtesy, but whether one Senator has a right—to arrest the action of the Senate? One Senator can do nothing. One Senator is no authority known to the Constitution and the laws. A notice by him to the Clerk is no official act. Nothing can be done by the Senate of the United States, nothing can be done in its name, but what is done by a majority of the Senate itself—that is, by the act of the body. I suppose I need not inform the Senate that any notice signed and served by the Senator from Louisiana upon the Secretary, never entered into the Journal, is no part of the proceedings of the Senate; yet I need not inform the Senate that the Senate transacts no business whatever that is not recorded and solemnly entered in its Journals. It is, therefore, very clear to me that the Senator has asserted a right which he cannot maintain; and that the retaining a bill for a motion to reconsider which has been done sometimes, as has been said by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, is a practice entirely consistent with the more rigid rule which I have insisted upon. The practice stated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky is this: if the Senate is about to adjourn to-day, is to be no longer in session to-day, but will be in session to-morrow morning, or next Monday morning, or some other time, then the Secretary does practically execute the order of the Senate immediately if, instead of to-day at the closing hours of this session, he does at an early hour of the next session of this body, or the next session of the House of Representatives, if it shall have adjourned in the mean time, communicate the action of the Senate to the House. I think it is best that we should understand the rule, and have it understood rightly, in order that there may be no sort of misapprehension, and so that the consequences resulting from it may not be complained of hereafter.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Before the Senator from Delaware proceeds, I should like the Clerk to read the order of Friday last from the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

"On motion of Mr. GREEN, that the Senate disagree to the amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 23. [The yeas and nays are given.]

"Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly."

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to a question of order. When the hour of one o'clock arrived the special order was called for. The Chair asked the indulgence of the Senate to make an explanation, and of course, I would not object to that. I have called twice for the special order, and I desire the decision of the Chair whether or not I am entitled to it.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senate chooses to stop the debate, I have not the slightest objection; but I have heard it continued by other Senators without objection. I know no reason why I should be excluded from taking part in it more than others.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I assure the Senator from Delaware that my call for the special order was not with any design to prevent him from being heard, but I have called twice for it; and I am notified on this side of the House that if this debate be continued it will be lengthy. I am not willing to sacrifice Minnesota under the circumstances, when I am perfectly satisfied that the whole time will be consumed fruitlessly. The privilege of holding the bill back exhausts itself to-day; and we shall spend the day and accomplish nothing if we go on with this debate. Therefore, I call for the special order.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the honorable Senator from Michigan states that he made a motion that this bill be communicated forthwith—which the order does not in terms do—to the House of Representatives, and that that motion is a privileged one. If it be so, beyond all question I have the right to proceed, unless it is the will of the Senate to take up the bill for the admission of Minnesota. If it is, I am very indifferent about it. I do not desire, in this or any other debate, to take up the time of the Senate when they would rather consider something else; but if the debate is to continue, I have a few remarks to make. Whatever is the will of the Senate, I am perfectly willing to submit to. I shall not take long, however. If the honorable Senator from Illinois moves to lay this matter on the table to take up the Minnesota bill, I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois to raise a question of order?

Mr. DOUGLAS. My point is, that the special order comes up at one o'clock.

Mr. BAYARD. This being a privileged question, takes precedence. A privileged question being under debate at the time of the arrival of the hour for the special order, it would not be superseded.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I submit the question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to execute now the order of the Senate, made on Friday last, directing him to communicate to the House of Representatives the action of the Senate on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senate that, when the hour of one o'clock arrived, without examining the question particularly, his impression was that the special order superseded the motion under consideration. Subsequent reflection and examination satisfy the Chair that all matters which have reference to previous orders, or business connected with the Senate obstructed by anything whatever, are privileged questions, and that this motion is a privileged question, and overrides the special order of the day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will avail myself of the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, if he is willing, and move to postpone this matter, and proceed with the Minnesota bill. I believe the day will be lost by going on with this debate. We might as well save the day, and devote it to Minnesota.

Mr. HALE. I have no disposition to debate this question; but I think it had better be decided. I have not the slightest feeling in this case; but I think really it is an important question, a very important question; one that we ought to settle. I have objection to the view that was presented by the Senator from Delaware, because he would leave it a discretionary question with the Clerk. I think the Clerk can have no discretion at all about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I called the Senator from Delaware to order, I must call the Senator from New Hampshire to order. The Vice President decided and ruled me down once or twice that a question as to the priority of business was not debatable. I must ask, therefore, for the Minnesota bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HALE. I want the question of order decided. What is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the further consideration of the privileged question, for the purpose of taking up the Minnesota bill.

Mr. HALE. Is not that debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is debatable.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Vice President ruled me down twice, and decided that it was not debatable. It was on the Kansas question, when I was trying to get an investigation into alleged frauds; and I must insist on the same rule now by which I was compelled to take my seat before. I confess I thought the decision wrong, but I submitted.

Mr. BIGGS. I think the Senator from Illinois is mistaken in regard to the ruling of the Chair. This question is certainly debatable, but debatable within a certain compass.

Mr. HALE. Exactly.

Mr. BIGGS. I think the Senator from Illinois does injustice to the Vice President in supposing that he ruled him down, and said it was not debatable at all. It is debatable; but debatable in a particular way, within certain limits, not on the merits of the questions proposed to be postponed and taken up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was said to be debatable to this extent: that you must not discuss the merits; but the parliamentary law is, that it is not allowable to discuss anything but the merits; and I suppose that the two exclude nearly all the debate there is here.

Mr. HALE. The Chair decides that I am in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that the Senator from New Hampshire is in order.

Mr. HALE. I think that is a very correct decision, sir. [Laughter.] I was going to say that this question ought to be decided, because, although I have not the slightest feeling in this matter, and do not care if you keep this Kansas bill here until the day of adjournment, I think that the practice is an important one in reference to the transaction of the business of the Senate. I object to the view presented by the Senator from Delaware, although I agree in the general scope of his remarks, in that it leaves a discretion to the Clerk. He says that now, when public business is not pressing, and no immediate danger can accrue, the Clerk may well retain the bill; but that near the close of the session, when the public business might be impeded, and a bill might be lost, under those circumstances, the Secretary would not be justified in retaining a bill. All that may be very true; but I object, and I call upon the Senate, at this stage, to put their vote of disapprobation upon the suggestion of a practice which will leave the Senate not subject to its own rules, or its own discretion, but subject to the discretion of the Clerk. I object to it altogether. He has no discretion, and ought to have none, and can have none. He sits there as the mere recording agent of the Senate, to record what they do, and to execute their orders.

Mr. BIGGS. I rise to a question of order. As I was on the side of the Senator from New Hampshire just now, contending that he had a right to debate this motion within certain limits, I am not to be understood as saying that general debate is in order. I did not understand the Chair to rule, and I do not understand it to be in order to discuss the merits of the proposition that is proposed to be postponed. Any reason why you should postpone one and take up another is competent; but it seems to me out of order to discuss the merits of the question proposed to be postponed, as was ruled by the Vice President, in the case to which the Senator from Illinois alluded.

Mr. HALE. I will take the ruling of the Chair upon that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like the decision of the Chair on this question, for I have suffered under the decision to which I alluded this year considerably. I only wish to know what the law is, and then I will abide by it, whatever it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I was not present when the Vice President ruled the Senator from Illinois out of order, on the day to which he alludes. I am not conversant with that ruling of his. If any Senator present will state to me what was ruled on that occasion, I am inclined very much to be governed by it; but I happened not to be in the Senate then.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I intended that a motion to postpone and take up opened both questions to discussion, so that you could show one to be more important than the other; but it was held otherwise; and on two occasions I was required to take my seat under that decision. It was said that I could simply make a suggestion that it was important to take up one bill at once, but that I must not go into a discussion of the merits of the question at all. I might make a simple suggestion and explanation of the importance of immediate action, but I must not discuss the question on its merits. I had to submit, and I did it with a good grace. I did not complain of the Chair then, though I thought the decision was wrong. I shall not complain of the Chair now, whatever it may decide, but my object is to find out what the law is, so as to keep within it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is no easy matter to limit the scope of debate when a question is opened to discussion. It is more a matter for the sense of the Senate, and especially for the Senator himself who is speaking, to limit himself, than for the Chair to determine whether he transcends the proper bounds. I would say that the Senator from New Hampshire, so far as he proceeded in his observations, seems to me to be in order.

Mr. HALE. I coincide with the suggestion of the honorable Senator from North Carolina. I think his limitation is right, and I am going to keep strictly within that. I am going to suggest to the Senator from Illinois, that there is no good system that goes on without exceptional cases. I think that his demonstration on the other side of the House on that question, under the circumstances, made an exceptional case, and there might possibly have been an administration of the rule, entirely consistent with the strictest integrity on the part of the Presiding Officer, a little more stringent than would be applied under the ordinary routine of our every day business. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I was going to say that the practice which is attempted to be substituted now is important to be decided at this time—I address myself to the Senator from North Carolina—because we want to have a rule established that shall enable the Clerk to determine what to do with the Minnesota bill when it shall pass, if I, voting for it, should ask him to keep it here three days. It is important to have the point decided now. The Senator from North Carolina will see that I am strictly within the letter and spirit of his rule. It is therefore that I proceed now to say that I think the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware is a dangerous one, that would leave any discretion with the Secretary, and when I say that—

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator probably misapprehended me.

Mr. HALE. I hope I did.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator from Illinois called me to order in the discussion of this question before I delivered my opinions, and the Senator from New Hampshire takes the floor and places them on a very different basis than I did.

Mr. HALE. I never made a bargain in legislative business in my life; but I will sit down and hear the Senator from Delaware gladly, if he will get up and make his speech. If not, I will go on. I say it is important to have this question settled now, for the reason that we want a rule adopted that shall guide the Clerk hereafter; and when I say that nothing should be left to the discretion of the Secretary, I wish to be understood as not raising the slightest objection to the individual who is Secretary, because I have as much confidence in his judgment, in his discretion, and in his integrity, as I have in that of any member of the body. It is simply an objection to the office. I say that the discretion should not be lodged there. He should have none; by the rule he has none, but the discretion belongs to the body. Any construction of the rule that leaves it discretionary with the Secretary whether he will carry a bill to the House to-day or to-morrow, or two days hence, at his pleasure, puts the Senate under the feet of the Secretary, and makes him the power to determine what the Senate ought to keep in their own hands; that is the direction and control of their own business; and any construction of the rule which goes to that extent must be a vicious one, and cannot be sustained.

Now, sir, I have no objection to its being the general understanding of the Senate that any Senator voting in the majority may go and ask the Secretary to keep a bill three days, and let it stay here. I will not complain of it; and I would not complain if it was carried even further than that, and you were to allow a person voting in the majority to go to the Clerk and say, "I mean to make an appeal to some of my friends in the majority and ask them to reconsider that vote, and I desire you to keep the bill here for that purpose." If you make that the construction of the rule, I have no objection to it, but I want it to be a fixed rule. I do not want a man there at the Secretary's desk when a Senator comes up who may be in the majority, who may be in a very large popular majority, to exercise a discretion that he, perhaps, will not feel himself at liberty to exercise when a Senator of an obnoxious minority comes up. It is putting the Secretary in an unpleasant and awkward predicament, and one in which he should not be left. He should not have it in his power to grant a favor to one Senator which he may feel himself at liberty to withhold from another; but the operation of the rule should be uniform. Either he should carry the bill, or he should not carry it; either he should retain it, if a Senator wishes him to do so, or he should not; but if he does, that should be a rule; or else if a Senator on that side of the House comes and asks the Secretary to-day to retain a bill three days, he may say, "Yes, I will;" and a week or a month hence we may pass the Minnesota bill, and I may vote with the majority, and I may go and say to the Secretary, "retain that bill three days." He may reply, "I do not know about that; the business of the session begins to be pressing, and I do not think it will be safe; I cannot grant your request, Mr. HALE. It is true, I did grant one four weeks ago, but the circumstances are changed." Now, does not every member of the body see how vicious such a construction of the rule would be, and in what an awkward and unpleasant predicament it would place the Secretary, when it would be in his discretion to grant a favor or withhold it? It is for this reason, without the slightest feeling upon the subject, and without the slightest care how you decide it one way or the other, that I do think that now the question is here, it ought to be decided, and there ought to be a construction which shall be uniform in its operation for all Senators and for all the session.

Mr. BAYARD. I will endeavor to place my views of the construction of this rule before the Senate. I am not aware that any construction has ever been given to it by the Senate; and I desire, briefly as I can, to place it on such grounds as satisfy my own judgment, at any rate. The question now before the Senate is on the motion made by the honorable Senator from Michigan, that the Senate direct their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the Kansas bill to be communicated to the House of Representatives forthwith. The question is, as it ought to be in all cases under these circumstances, for the will of the majority to decide whether they see fit to do so or not. There is no positive rule of the Senate which requires that any measure shall be communicated to the other House the moment it has passed the Senate. The parliamentary usage is, of course, that the officer of the Senate communicates it as soon as conveniently may be. There must be time for engrossing the bill, or resolution, or whatever it may be; and, in the performance of that duty, a discretion must be allowed, and always is allowed. The more important measure will often be hurried, where the less important one will be engrossed later, though the two bills might pass on the same day. There must be a reasonable discretion.

Then the next point which arises is, whether there is anything unreasonable in the discretion; whether, when you have a rule extending the parliamentary right of reconsideration, but at the same time limiting its exercise to three days of actual session, it is an abuse of the rule to retain a bill at the request of a Senator for that period of time within which a motion to reconsider may be made, though the bill may be engrossed. I can see no danger in such a discretion, because it is always competent for a Senator, if he thinks a bill ought to be communicated at once, to make a motion for that purpose, as has been done in this case by the honorable Senator from Michigan; and then, of course, the will of the majority of the Senate will prevail. The presumption always must be, that the Senate will be governed by a regard for the public interests.

The old parliamentary law was, that a motion to reconsider could be made at any time, provided the bill or resolution remained in the possession of the body which passed it. There was no limitation of time at all; but the motion could not be made after the bill or proposition had passed out of the possession of the body. Such a motion cannot be made here after the subject-matter has passed out of the possession of the Senate; but the rule has a double effect: it fixes a distinct limitation of time within which a motion to reconsider must be made, and it also requires that it shall be made while the bill remains in the possession of the body. Both are requisite under the rule. It is the duty of the Secretary, without any positive written rule, but under parliamentary order, within a convenient time after a bill has passed, to communicate it to the other House. There is no order prescribed for doing this; there is no rule which requires bills to be communicated to the House of Representatives in the order in which they pass the Senate. That is in the discretion of the officer. If he abuses and perverts his discretion, he is responsible to the Senate for mal-administration of his duty; not otherwise; and it is in our power to say whether he has performed his duties faithfully or not. It is in the power of the majority always to require him to act. There must, however, be a discretion in the performance of these ministerial duties, always subject to be corrected by the body, on the motion of any Senator who thinks precedence has been given in the engrossment or communication to the other House of one bill of less public importance than another.

Under these circumstances, the rule of the Senate being that within a reasonable, limited time, a member may move a reconsideration, (and if you think that time too long, shorten it,) I can see no impropriety whatever in allowing him to request the Secretary, or the Presiding Officer, if you please, not to send the bill to the other House, as he intends to move, or probably may move, or has not made up his mind whether he will yet move a reconsideration or not. The time allowed him for that purpose is three days; and if there is no public exigency that requires a bill to be sent to the House of Representatives at once, I think it is a reasonable discretion to leave it to the officer, on that request being made, to refrain from communicating the bill forthwith. That he shall so communicate it is not required by any order of the Senate. The parliamentary rule is, that it shall be done within a convenient time. There is no specific time fixed. It may be done on the same day, or upon any subsequent day. That depends upon the press of public business, and the relative character and importance of the bill. In other words, it is a reasonable discretion; the bill is to be sent within a reasonable time.

Looking, then, to the rule, it seems to me there is neither danger of abuse nor injury to the rights of anybody. When a member says to the Secretary, "I wish that bill retained," I presume he would always retain it. Such has been the practice heretofore. Since I have been in the Senate, I have known repeated instances of that kind, where bills have been retained, not at my request, but at the request of others. On the other hand, I have known applications made to the Secretary to expedite the engrossment of particular bills, with a view to have them sent to the other House at once on account of their public importance or pressing character. If there was any abuse on the part of the officer, any partiality practiced, growing out of a preference for particular members, or from other causes, all that would be in the control of the Senate, and the abuse could not go to any extent that would not be controlled. It comes back then, practically, to this result: a member may request the Secretary not to send a particular bill to the other House at once; he does not do it as an absolute right; he only effects in this way that which he could effect by a motion to reconsider; and then, if it is the will of the majority that the bill shall lie until the three days expire, very well; but, at the same time, it is in the power of a majority of the Senate to decide that it shall be sent at once. On the subject being brought before them, it is for the Senate to say whether they will allow the bill to be retained for the full time within which a Senator may make a motion to reconsider, in order to give him an opportunity to determine whether he will make the motion.

I see no danger of abuse in allowing the officer of the Senate, under the rule of the Senate, to exercise the discretion at the request of a Senator, if reasonable, the public business not interfering, of not sending a bill at once, because that is not his imperative duty. His duty is to send it as soon as convenient, and it is only conveniently delayed if it is withheld in accordance with the request of a Senator for the time allowed in the rule, every other Senator being at liberty to move that the bill be communicated forthwith, as has been done in this case by the honorable Senator from Michigan, and then the will of the majority prevails.

Then the question arises whether there is any such public necessity as requires the request of the honorable Senator from Louisiana to be overruled on the motion of the honorable Senator from Michigan, and the disagreement of the Senate to the House amendment to be communicated before the time allowed under the ordinary rule of the Senate for a reconsideration has expired. I do not ask the Senator from Louisiana to say that he will move a reconsideration; I do not think you have a right to ask that. Unless you think public exigency or public utility requires that the vote of the Senate should be at once communicated, it would certainly be discourteous to say to the Senator, "Well, sir, have you made up your mind?" He replies, "I announce no determination to you on that; I only ask that I shall have the privilege that belongs to every Senator, to move a reconsideration within three days; and if it is the will of the majority of the Senate that I shall have that privilege within the three days, the majority will give it to me." If we had communicated the bill to the House of Representatives, and he should make the motion to reconsider within three days, we could send a message to the House of Representatives recalling the bill. Practically, I think under this construction of the rule it comes to the same point; and the majority of the Senate will decide. I will not assume in any case that the majority would give one member privileges that do not belong to another; but I take it for granted that the majority of the Senate will always exercise their discretion—which they have a right to do—of deciding whether it is proper that any measure voted upon in the Senate shall be communicated in one day, or two days, or three days, to the House of Representatives. That is in the discretion of the majority, and it is a legitimate discretion; quite as much so as the passage of the bill itself.

I do not admit that a Senator has any right to require the Secretary to keep back a bill; and if the officer declined to retain the bill, he could have made his motion to the Senate that the bill should be retained, and the majority, then, would have determined it. If, on the request of the Senator from Louisiana, he has retained the bill on the ground that it is not an unreasonable request to delay it for the period of time within which a reconsideration may be moved, I can see no wrong or impropriety on the part of the officer. If it be considered to be a misjudgment, any Senator can make a motion that the bill be communicated at once, and then the will of the majority must determine the matter; and after all it comes to that, the majority will control the business of the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. I am not disposed to carry on this discussion further. I wish to know if it is the pleasure of the Senate to take up the Minnesota bill? I move to lay this motion of the Senator from Michigan on the table for the present, so that we may proceed with the Minnesota bill. If it is not laid on the table, I desire to discuss it.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GREEN. I insist that the Senator from Michigan reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. STUART. It was in writing some time ago.

Mr. GREEN. Then I ask the Clerk to read it. The Clerk read it, as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to execute now the order of the Senate, made on Friday last, directing him to communicate to the House of Representatives the action of the Senate on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Wright, and Yulee—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—24.

So the motion was laid on the table.

Mr. STUART. I now call the attention of the Chair to the Manual, page 79, where will be found these words:

"The only case where a member has a right to insist on anything, is where he calls for the execution of a subsisting order of the House. Here, there having been already a resolution, any person has a right to insist that the Speaker, or any other whose duty it is, shall carry it into execution; and no debate or delay can be had on it. Thus, any member has a right to have the House or gallery cleared of strangers, an order existing for that purpose, or to have the House told when there is not a quorum present."—2 Hats. 87-129.

This is an order of the Senate, and I insist that it shall be executed.

Mr. IVERSON. Is that question debatable?

Mr. STUART. No, sir.

Mr. IVERSON. Then I protest against the execution of this order. I deny that there is any order to send this bill to the House of Representatives before the expiration of three days.

Mr. GREEN. I inquire if the order specifies any time within which it shall be executed?

Mr. PUGH. I believe there is no question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A question is made by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PUGH. That is a demand by the Senator from Michigan on you, sir, with which you can comply or not, I suppose, as you consider the Senator's authority. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan make a request of the Presiding Officer?

Mr. STUART. If the Chair will turn his attention to the page of the Manual I have mentioned, he will see that I have a right to insist that the order of last Friday shall be executed without debate or delay.

Mr. PUGH. My motion is to proceed with the special order. I presume the President will do what he thinks is his duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator from Michigan that in the absence of any familiarity with the rules, the Chair would regard the vote of the Senate recently taken, as instructing him upon the request that he makes, and for the present declines granting his motion or request.

Mr. STUART. All I have power to do is to have it entered in the proceedings of the Senate that I insist upon the execution of this order. Beyond that, I am powerless.

Mr. SEWARD. I suppose the decision of the Chair is subject to appeal, and I beg leave to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I understand the Chair to decide that he construes the vote given, as instruction not to execute the order; and from that decision of the Chair I appeal.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think there is nothing in the point of order raised by the Senator from Michigan; but in order to disembarass the Chair and relieve the Senate from further delay in this matter, I will make a motion that I think will be in order. It is clearly in order now to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives; is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I voted with the majority. I have the right, at any time within two legislative days, to move to reconsider that vote. I make the motion to reconsider; and move that that motion be postponed until to-morrow, and made the special order at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made.

Mr. HALE. To make it a special order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not to make it a special order. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose that is not before the Senate. It is not up. The Senator has a right to enter the motion to reconsider, but the bill itself is not before the body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask for the special order.

Mr. KING. Let us have this disposed of.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am willing that the special order shall be taken up; but if it is not the pleasure of the Senate to take up the special order, I have a right to have my motion entered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is entered.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I have a right to move to postpone the consideration of that motion to any future day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not until the subject is taken up.

Mr. BIGGS. I suppose the Senator from Indiana has a perfect right to move the reconsideration, and it will be entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is entered.

Mr. BIGGS. And that disposed, as a matter of course, of the question raised by the Senator from Michigan; and the order of the Senate now is to proceed to the consideration of the special order. That is the business, as I understand, now before the Senate.

Mr. YULEE. I think the Senate have given no such order as that we proceed to the consideration of any particular matter. They have simply directed that the particular subject then under discussion should be laid upon the table. Now, a motion for reconsideration, being a privileged question, can be made at all times. The Senator from Indiana has very properly exercised a right which he has within the rules. That motion to reconsider is a privileged question. It has been decided frequently, in both Houses, that it is the right of any member, the member making the motion, or any other member desiring to discuss it, on one side or the other, to call that up as a privileged question, at any time, in preference to any other business, the Senate or House not being at the time engaged in other matters. The Senator from Indiana, then, having made the motion, and having immediately followed that motion by another, that it be taken up for consideration with a view of postponing it until to-morrow, the motion, as a privileged motion, is in order; and until a question is taken upon that no other subject is in order, as I apprehend.

Mr. BRIGHT. If the Chair will allow me, I will abridge my motion. I will let it stand simply as a motion to reconsider. It is then in the power of the Senate to say whether they will consider it now or to-morrow, or any other day.

Mr. SEWARD. Before that motion was made I had raised a question of order. I think that question of order has not been disposed of, and it is my right to have it decided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator from New York, that the Senator from Indiana modified his motion before there was any action upon it, and it was strictly in order for him to do so. He now makes a motion simply to reconsider.

Mr. SEWARD. Does the Chair decide that that cuts off the question of order which I raised on the previous decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir, that supersedes the proposition made by the Senator from Michigan and all incidental questions connected with it.

Mr. SEWARD. I only want to know how the matter stands.

Mr. YULEE. I understand the state of the question now to be that the Senator from Indiana, exercising a right under the rules, has moved a reconsideration of the vote of the Senate on the Kansas bill. That question is before the Senate, and I now move that it be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow, carrying out the view of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BIGGS. I do not understand that the Senator from Florida can make this motion. According to the order of the Senate heretofore made, the special order for this day at one o'clock, was the Minnesota bill. This question was entertained in regard to the matter suggested by the Senator from Michigan, as a privileged question overriding the special order. Several points have arisen in connection with it, and in the midst of them the Senator from Indiana, it being in order at any time, it being a privileged question, has moved to reconsider the vote that is the subject of controversy. It is proper to entertain that motion; but it is not proper, during the pendency of the order of the Senate to proceed to the special order, to move anything more than the reconsideration, and have it entered. The business properly before the Senate now, is the special order, which is the bill for the admission of Minnesota, which came up regularly, but was superseded by the privileged question, at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that the question just disposed of was taken up in preference to the special order. That having been settled by the action of the Senate, the special order comes up now as the regular business. The bill for the admission of Minnesota is now before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Chair decided that the motion made by the Senator from Florida was in order a moment or two ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is competent for the Senator from Florida to move to postpone the further consideration of the special order if he desires to make that motion.

Mr. YULEE. What does the Chair understand to be the special order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill for the admission of Minnesota.

Mr. YULEE. The point I made was this: that the Senate had passed the hour of one o'clock with what was considered to be a privileged question, and the Minnesota bill, therefore, had lost its precedence and its right of consideration, the Senate having virtually overrode it by a privileged question. That question was then laid upon the table. Before the Minnesota bill was taken up, before it was ordered to be taken up by the Senate, or before the President had announced it as being in order, the Senator from Indiana moved a reconsideration, as he had a right to do, of a vote which had been previously taken by the Senate upon the Kansas bill. That also was then before the Senate; and it was for the Senate to consider whether they would proceed with it then, or postpone it to a future time, as a privileged question. I hold that a motion to reconsider is a privileged question. It is the right of any member to insist upon its immediate consideration, or, at the pleasure of the Senate, that it be postponed for future consideration. Considering that to be the question, then, legitimately before the Senate, I made a motion that it be postponed until to-morrow; and I made that motion only because that seemed to be the desire of the Senator who moved the reconsideration, it having been part of his original proposition. It seems to me that that is the motion before the Senate. It has been ruled over and over again, in both Houses, that a motion to reconsider is a privileged question; and that, whenever no other matter is immediately before the body, it is in the power of any member—either the member moving it or any other—to insist upon the consideration of the motion, it having once been made.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator is evidently mistaken, I think. The Vice President decided this very question within the last two weeks, when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] made a motion to reconsider and endeavored to keep it before the Senate. The Vice President said he had the privilege to make the motion, and it was entered; but no further attention was ever paid to it. He said the Senator from Wisconsin could not keep it before the Senate. I have no doubt the Senator from Indiana had a right to make his motion to reconsider. That is the entire extent of his privilege; and until he can get the floor regularly, he cannot move to proceed to the consideration of his motion. The special order is properly before the Senate, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state—

Mr. HALE. What is the decision of the Chair? There is so much noise I cannot hear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the special order was postponed in consequence of the precedence given to the privileged question; and when the privileged question was postponed, the special order came up in its proper place, being entitled to precedence. It is in order for any Senator, in the absence of a pending question, to make a motion to reconsider. If the Senator from Florida desires to attain his object, he must move to postpone the special order for the purpose of entertaining the motion he now makes.

Mr. HALE. As I have the floor, and the Senator from Florida has not, I will do a kindness for him, and make that motion myself, to postpone the special order for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the question moved by the Senator from Indiana; and upon that I have not much to say; but what I have to say will be rather in the form of an interrogatory than anything else. My interrogatory is this: I desire to know what has become of that tremendous pressure that we all felt here in the Senate last Thursday, so that having voted to adjourn over from Thursday to Monday, but having found out during the day that the House had put an amendment to our bill that we had sent over to them, we felt obligated, from high motives of public duty as disinterested patriots, to forego that relaxation which a little while before we thought necessary for ourselves, and that religious ardor which prompted us to observe Good Friday, to forego patriotism and religion both, and rescind the order by which we had agreed to adjourn from Thursday to Monday, and come here on Friday to hurry through this Kansas bill? Well, sir, we did it. I should have opposed it, but I saw that the feeling on Thursday was so strong that it was idle for me, backed up as I was by the considerations due to Good Friday, to oppose that reconsideration. The reconsideration passed. Kansas came up, and we discharged ourselves of the duty which we owed to Kansas and to the country forthwith, and it was sent over to the House. ["Oh, no!"] It has not been sent over to the House, but it was ordered to be sent; and when it had previously gone over to the House before our second action, it came back here within, I think, ten minutes after it passed the House, showing that there was such hot haste that somebody had put the engrossing clerks to work, and actually engrossed the amendment before it was made; so that it got here almost as soon as the Speaker announced that it had passed. Then we reconsidered our motion to adjourn over; took it up on Friday and disposed of it, a great pressure seeming to rest both on the House and the Senate; and now it is all gone; there is no pressure anywhere. [Laughter.] Now, instead of a zeal to carry the thing forward, everybody seems desirous of rather setting it back, standing still, delaying, putting it off. Here is a majority, who were in such a hurry last Thursday and Friday, now moving to postpone the subject until to-morrow, which means indefinitely. We all know what to-morrow means legislatively. I remember when I first came into the House of Representatives, a good while ago, a motion was introduced, and some gentleman moved to postpone it until to-morrow. It was a new member who made the motion, and he objected. An old member sat by him, and said it was only until to-morrow. The young man gave up, and that to-morrow he did not reach for three months. The proposition here is to postpone this matter until to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if it is in that view that he moves to postpone the Minnesota bill until to-morrow? [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I do not move to postpone it to any particular time, but to put it aside for the purpose of deciding this question. I want to follow the organ of the Committee on Territories as far as I can with safety; and I do not know that that would be a great way. [Laughter.] His zeal seemed to be to hurry up Kansas, so that Minnesota should not overtake her; but now it seems they have got Kansas along to such a place that they have concluded to put her up, tie her to the stall, and let her stand until Minnesota comes up and goes ahead. I object to it. I feel just as patriotic now as I did last Thursday. There has been no change in me; none at all. I feel just as desirous to do justice to Kansas now as I did then. If there are any reasons—if there are any particular reasons of a public character—let them be stated; and if there are any of a private character, I should like to hear them. I would not call any man to order if he should state private reasons. I would not object to any man saying something like this if he should choose: "There are some arguments that I want to address to some members of the House, that it will not do to address in open debate; and I want the thing kept open until I can have an opportunity of talking privately with some gentlemen, and pressing upon their private ear some considerations which are not proper or not expedient to be addressed in open debate." We all know, or perhaps we do not all know it, but it is a fact, that it is a part of the discipline of some churches, when there is a recalcitrant member, to go with him privately, before they take public steps; to give private admonition before public censure comes; and I would not object if anything of that sort were in the way; but I think we owe it to the country, we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to our own reputation, to assign some possible, some plausible reason why we have got over the haste that impelled us forward last week. What new feature is there? The news of the Connecticut election, of course, has nothing to do with it—not the slightest. [Laughter.] What possible object can there be in postponing, from day to day, a subject about which we were in such hot haste a little while ago? Why, sir, a few weeks ago we were in such a hurry to dispose of Kansas that we had to sit up here until morning light; until six o'clock in the morning.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The business was pressing at that time!

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir, public business was pressing then; and it has been pressing up to a certain point, and I should like to know where is the point, and what is the occasion? It used to be a maxim of the old philosophers that the atmospheric pressure would sustain a hydraulic column of thirty-three feet; and it puzzled the philosophers to tell why the pressure of the atmosphere would sustain a hydraulic column of thirty-three feet, and would not sustain it any higher. The reason assigned was, that Nature abhorred a vacuum, but when it got up to thirty-three feet she ceased to abhor a vacuum. [Laughter.] Now, sir, have we got to that point where we cease to abhor a vacuum in legislation?

For these reasons I am desirous of proceeding with this Kansas bill now; and I appeal to those gentlemen who were so anxious to take it up last week, and some time ago, to go with me. Let us stanch the wounds of bleeding Kansas. There is just as much necessity for it now as there was then. Let us see if we cannot apply a remedy. I am anxious to apply a remedy. I think the House of Representatives have offered a fair and a rational proposition. I want to send it back, and I want to make an appeal, a patriotic appeal, to the friends of popular sovereignty to vindicate the sincerity of their professions by going for this measure of popular sovereignty. It takes everything they ask, takes the Lecompton constitution, with slavery for its great divinity; it takes everything you have asked, and inaugurates it as the supreme law of the land, subject only to that great test to which you have all invited us, popular sovereignty. I want to see if we cannot do that, and I want to see if we cannot do it now. If there are any objections, let them be stated, and let them be stated now. I appeal to the friends of this bill not to wait. Who knows but that after we receive the news of the Rhode Island election, which I believe takes place to-morrow, there may be new considerations coming in that may require further delay and further postponement?

Mr. WADE. Is the Union in danger?

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether the Union is in danger or not; I have never discussed that question; but I will say this: if the Union is in danger from the fair and prompt and legitimate discharge of public duty, I am not going to be one that will try to avert it. Let the danger come, and let it be met, and let it be met now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from New Hampshire state distinctly the motion he made? The Chair does not recollect it.

Mr. HALE. My motion was to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of considering the proposition made by the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the motion was not agreed to; and announced that the special order was before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I want a division on the vote last taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Massachusetts that he has already decided that question, and it is too late to call for a division.

Mr. HAMLIN. How can we know, before the Chair decides, whether we want a division or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators should call for it in a reasonable time after the result is announced.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Minnesota bill is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope we shall proceed to vote upon the bill, unless there are amendments to offer.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the preamble of this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is to be settled after the bill passes.

Mr. PUGH. It was decided in the House of Representatives the other day, that the preamble could not be amended after the passage of the bill. I desire to amend the preamble, and I do not care whether it be done now, or at a subsequent time.

Mr. STUART. The rule is, that the preamble is always to be considered after the bill has passed.

Mr. PUGH. It was decided otherwise on the Kansas bill in the House of Representatives the other day. It is so reported in the Globe. I do not care whether I offer the amendment now or at a future time. If the Chair says it will be in order hereafter, I will not offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The amendment will be in order after the bill shall have been perfected.

Mr. PUGH. Very well.

Mr. YULEE. As I intimated at one time my purpose to propose an amendment to this bill, I think it proper to say that I have since concluded to withhold it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. FITCH. Before this subject passes from the Committee of the Whole, I desire to call attention to a matter in connection with it, of very little importance except as an issue of fact between the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and myself. It will be remembered that, on Friday last, in noticing what I deemed, perhaps erroneously, a disposition upon his part to intimidate northern Senators, or, more properly, all Senators from whatever section, in favor of the immediate admission of Minnesota, into a negative vote on a motion to adjourn, by alluding to the vote as a test of friendship for Minnesota, as though those who voted in the affirmative would be deemed its enemies, I took exception to the manifestation of any such disposition, and ventured to suggest that the then zeal of the Senator for immediate action upon the Minnesota bill was new-born; that none such had been manifested by him when, in February, although the chairman of the Committee on Territories, and as such having the bill in special charge, he assented to the Kansas bill being made a special order, and thereby being placed in advance of the Minnesota bill. To my suggestion of a want of earnestness, previously to that day, in urging the Minnesota bill, the Senator entered a general denial, and appealed to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] to sustain him; and he specifically denied having assented that the Kansas bill should be made a special order. To the appeal made by him, the Senator from Missouri responded, and bore testimony, very properly, to the anxiety manifested by the Senator from Illinois, in the Committee on Territories, for early action upon the Minnesota bill. This was but an act of justice to the latter Senator, but it was taking the case where it had not been and could not be taken by me. I knew nothing of what had occurred in the Committee on Territories, and could not know aught that had there transpired. My remarks related solely to action in the Senate. The Senator from Illinois, doubtless, did evince anxiety, in that committee, for early action on the Minnesota bill, and his anxiety must have been gratified, for he early reported that bill to the Senate. It was here in advance of the Kansas bill, and would have so remained unless the latter had been made a special order. My suggestion was that his anxiety appeared to cease, to dwindle out, soon after the bill was reported by the Committee on Territories. I am glad to see it renewed, and am more than willing to second it.

But, sir, unwilling to do injustice to any one, anxious to make no statement not in strict accordance with the facts, and determined not to rest under the imputation which a denial of any statement I had made would imply, I have since looked at the record to see whether it corroborated my statement or the denial of the Senator from Illinois. Although it affords other proof in support of my general suggestion, I shall content myself with reading a very brief extract from it in answer to the Senator's denial that he did assent to making the Kansas bill a special order. On the 24th of February, I find by the Globe of the 25th, that these proceedings occurred:

"Mr. GREEN. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, for the purpose of then moving to make it a special order."

"The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time."

"Mr. GREEN. I move that it be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, if it meets general approbation."

A brief running debate ensued, in which the Senator from Illinois participated; but he said little of Kansas and nothing at all of Minnesota. He made no objections to making Kansas a special order; he did not give the slightest intimation that he entertained any objection; on the contrary, after this debate, the following appears as the conclusion of the report on that subject:

"The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to make the bill the special order for Friday next, at one o'clock."

"Mr. COLLAMER. I move to amend the motion by saying Monday."

"The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to."

It will be seen that I was correct, and that the Senator from Illinois—his denial to the contrary notwithstanding—did assent to making Kansas a special order. I have no further issue with the Senator. The issue is between him and the record.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It will be seen by what the Senator from Indiana has read, that his statement is not correct.

Mr. FITCH. I will read the entire record, if the Senator makes a question of veracity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FITCH. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When the Senator stated, on Friday, that I had agreed to put the Kansas bill ahead of the Minnesota bill, the Senator from Missouri, who is associated with me on the committee, said, in an undertone, "it is a mistake." The Senator from Missouri knew that I never made that agreement. I never consented to it. I knew that I should be overruled, as I was; but I appeal to every man in the Senate if, from the beginning of the session up to this time, I have not been vigilant, active, constant in my efforts to get up the Minnesota bill, and secure the admission of Minnesota. I do not think there is a man in this body who does believe in his heart that I am justly liable to the charge of having kept Minnesota back. I do not believe the Senator from Indiana himself thinks that I have sacrificed the interests of Minnesota. No, sir; on all occasions, as far as I thought it was prudent and respectful to the Senate, I have persevered over and over again in my efforts to get up the Minnesota bill.

Now, sir, one word about the Senator's remark the other day, that I was dragging men into hot-haste action on the Minnesota bill. How in the world could the Senator have considered that the remark I made applied to him? He had just voted with me on each call of the roll, and would I drag men who were voting with me? How is it, unless he goes out of the record to seek this opportunity, that he applies what I said to himself? Motions to adjourn had been made; I resisted them, voted against them, and the Senator voted with me. Other motions were made to get rid of the Minnesota bill, and on them he voted with me. Then, when another motion was made, I said a few words; and how could he, who had voted with me each time, think I was trying to drag him, when he was voting with me. [Mr. FITCH, by an inclination of his head, appeared to dissent.] I think he did each time. Well, sir, I have great aversion for these personal altercations. I claim no merit for my action in regard to Minnesota; but I repel indignantly any insinuation that I have not been faithful to the interests of Minnesota, so far as I am concerned, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, and as a Senator. I have arraigned no Senator for his action. I have gone back to no one's record. I make no issue with any one. I follow the plan of doing my own duty, and I leave every other Senator to do his. I do not deem it necessary to say more on this point.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana will indulge the Chair for a moment. It is with great reluctance that the Chair interposes, but he really does not see the pertinency of the discussion between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. FITCH. Its pertinency is simply a question of veracity between the Senator and myself; and if I am not permitted to make the explanation in any other way, I shall claim it as a personal privilege. No Senator shall say that I have not stated the case truthfully.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. FITCH. Then I claim it as a special privilege; a personal one.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust the Senator will be allowed to present his proof on the point of the issue he tries to make. I hope it will be permitted.

Several Senators. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair interposes with great reluctance, but he cannot see the pertinency of the discussion, now pending between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana, to the bill before the Senate, and therefore respectfully suggests that this personal debate is not pertinent to the question.

Mr. FITCH. Then I shall content myself with simply saying that the denial of the Senator of the record, which I have read, is in itself an untruth. There is the record—

Mr. DOUGLAS. That last declaration is unnecessary. The record proves his statement to be an untruth, and I am willing to abide by it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the Senators to order.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Presiding Officer permit the record to be read? I read a portion of it, and it is proper, after this denial, to read the whole.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. FITCH. It is too late for the Senator from Illinois to raise a question of veracity with the record, with me, or with any one else here.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not trying to make a question of veracity. I have not said a word about the Senator from Indiana or his course. I have only said that a charge of infidelity to Minnesota could not be truthfully urged against me [the Presiding Officer rapped for order] and I repel the charge. I have not arraigned him for his course—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is out of order. The Chair rules that both Senators are out of order, and that the discussion is improper. ["Question!" "Question!" "If no further amendment be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate."] If no further amendment be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

[Mr. Fitch having asked that the whole record be read, at his request it is hereto appended:

"Mr. GREEN. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, for the purpose of then moving to make it a special order.

"The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time.

"Mr. GREEN. I move that it be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, if it meets general approbation. [Say Monday.] My object is, to get the question out of the way, for it impedes the progress of all other subjects. It will be discussed for some considerable time, and everybody will have a fair opportunity to discuss it before final action.

"Mr. SEWARD. My vote on that motion will depend somewhat on what we can ascertain as to the probable course of debate. I beg leave to ask, if the Senator has no objection, whether he intends to take the floor, as I suppose is his right, at the time appointed, and whether there is any understanding that the members of the committee are to go on with the debate, or whether it will devolve on somebody else? I want to speak on this question on such a day as I can consistently with the rights of the members of the Committee on Territories.

"Mr. GREEN. In reply to the Senator's question, I can inform him that, so far as I am concerned, I shall desire to do nothing but to make a little statement, reserving my right to answer whatever may be said against the principles of the report. I believe the majority of the committee have no desire to push themselves forward in the debate, hastily, at any time. Of course they reserve their right to be heard during the progress of the debate. What the minority may desire to do, I am not able to say. The friends of the measure generally are not disposed to prevent a fair hearing on all sides, so far as the Senate may desire, and will not undertake to crowd it through, unless a factious opposition be set up, which we do not apprehend.

"Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to make a remark on another point. I have observed, in a very large number of newspapers, of various political complexions, that have come to me within the last few days, that during the ten days I was confined to my house in consequence of illness, reports went out from here in which it was stated that it was believed a caucus of Democratic Senators had formally read out of the party my friend from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], my friend from California, [Mr. BRODERICK], and myself. I rise for the purpose of asking my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALLEN], who was the president of that caucus, whether there is any truth in those statements?

"Mr. ALLEN. I was the presiding officer of that caucus; but I heard nothing of reading out any member of the Democratic party from that caucus.

"Mr. DOUGLAS. I supposed such was the case, and yet I thought it was proper to call on the chairman of the caucus to make this statement, as I was absent and had no means of knowing what was done, except on the informal inquiries I have made, to which I received the same answer. I will take occasion to remark, that during the fourteen years I have been here, no caucus has ever yet been held by which the right was claimed to make any measure a party measure. It was not done on the Nebraska bill; it never has been done on any other bill. I understand it has not been done on this Lecompton question. The friends of the Nebraska bill met—men of all parties; and the opponents of the Nebraska bill met—men of all parties. The friends of the Lecompton constitution may meet, and its opponents also; but no party caucus has ever yet taken jurisdiction of a measure to declare it a party measure, much less have they undertaken to read anybody out of a party for differing from them.

"Mr. IVerson. At the suggestion of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH], I will take occasion to make a response to the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois; and it is proper I should do so, inasmuch as the only action of that caucus was on a resolution which I offered.

"Mr. TOOMBS. I will take the liberty with my colleague, which I do in the kindest manner possible, and probably I would not have done it to any other Senator, but I can take the liberty with my colleague in account of our relations, to object to these explanations in the Senate of what took place in caucus. I hope my colleague will let it drop. I say it in the kindest spirit. Those gentlemen who choose to bring it forward here may do so.

"Mr. IVerson. My only object was to disabuse the mind of the Senator from Illinois.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must rule that these explanations are not in order.

"Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust the Senator from Georgia may be permitted to make his statement. It is informal, but I trust there will be no objection to it. As he says he offered the resolution, I think it is proper he should now have an opportunity of explaining.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not arrest the remarks which have been made, though they were none of them strictly in order.

"Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall renew the objection. I do not think this is in order.

"Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not wish to push this question any further. It has gone far enough. I understand the resolution which was offered was to the effect that it was conceded on all hands that the caucus disclaimed such right, intention, or power.

"Mr. GREEN. I wish, in further response to the interrogatory of the Senator from New York, to remark that, on consultation with one of the minority of the committee, I shall waive my right to make any opening remarks at all, but let the debate go on and take its fullest range.

"Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that, by the ordinary usage of the Senate, the gentleman who presents the report of the committee has the privilege, and it is expected of him generally, that he should open the debate, that we may be possessed of the views he proposes to present, and the arguments which he calculates to rely upon in support of his position. It is also his privilege to close the debate. We understand that; but we understand generally in law, and certainly in propriety, that, if a gentleman waives his opening, he waives his close. If that is understood, it is all very well.

"Mr. GREEN. That is not understood.

"Mr. COLLAMER. Then I understand the gentleman means to close, though he does not mean to make an opening. According to that view, the gentleman is distinctly to understand that I must close upon his closing; for it is the only time I shall have to answer. I take it, there can be no objection to that.

"Mr. GREEN. Under ordinary circumstances, it might be insisted on with a little more pertinacity that I should open the debate on this matter; but I have made one elaborate speech on this subject, I have made my report; and I shall not, in my remarks, deviate from the principles and from the facts as therein set forth. My object will be to vindicate them as assailed and attacked, not to restate principles, positions, and facts that I have heretofore stated. He can reply to that, and then I will respond, if I see proper to do so.

"Mr. COLLAMER. It is my privilege, also, to have made a report, in which I have stated my views, in common with my associate on the committee who agreed with me in opinion, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE]; but I do not consider that that in any way precludes me from enlarging upon those views, nor does it relieve me from the duty, perhaps, of elaborating and sustaining them. So it is with the Senator from Missouri; but the view I have is very obvious from general usage.

"Mr. GREEN. I am willing to do it, or to waive it.

"Mr. COLLAMER. I do not mean to urge the gentleman to open the case; but I do not wish him to close a debate which he has not opened. I want it distinctly understood that he is not to close it if he does not open it. If that is understood it is all very well.

"Mr. GREEN. If the Senator desires me to open it, he shall be gratified. I supposed I was gratifying them by waiving my right to open; but if it is insisted upon, he shall be gratified to his heart's content.

"Mr. COLLAMER. I have distinctly stated, and I now restate, as the gentleman does not choose to understand me, that I do not request him to open it, but I request that, if he will not open, he will not close it.

"Mr. GREEN. I do not think he need have so much apprehension about my ability in closing.

"Mr. HALE. Before the question is taken, as I feel a little responsibility about the Army bill, I wish to know what is the intention as to that? Is this subject to supersede it?

"Mr. IVerson. I take this occasion to say what I desired to say, and should have said some time during the progress of the morning, that, as soon as the personal discussion between the two Senators from Tennessee shall have ended, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Army bill, with a view to press it as rapidly as possible to a conclusion. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is so unwell that he will not be able to be here for some days, perhaps a week or ten days. It is useless, therefore, to keep the Army bill back in consequence of his indisposition, and we ought to get rid of it as soon as possible. I shall endeavor to press the Army bill to-day, and, if it is possible, to get a vote of the Senate upon it.

"Mr. SEWARD. What is the motion now?

"The VICE PRESIDENT. That the bill for the admission of Kansas be made the special order for to-morrow, at one o'clock.

"Mr. SEWARD. We may have the Army bill before us, and the present day is mortgaged. I would suggest the day after to-morrow, or Monday.

"Several Senators. Say Friday.

"Mr. GREEN. Well, Friday will do. I move to make it the special order for that day.

"Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the motion by striking out Friday and inserting Monday. To-day is undoubtedly to be occupied, and the Army bill cannot be disposed of very soon. ["No, No!"] I withdraw the motion with the understanding that the Army bill is to be first disposed of.

"Mr. COLLAMER. It is a matter of accommodation with gentlemen to fix the time when it can be taken up. Putting it for to-morrow, or the next day, leaves the matter in perfect uncertainty. Those of us who feel it to be our duty to participate in the debate, perhaps early, should like to know what is the certainty. If you say Monday we shall know that there is something certain.

"Mr. TOOMBS. Let us take it up on Friday if we can get to it after disposing of the Army bill.

"Mr. COLLAMER. But that leaves us in uncertainty as to the time when it will be taken up.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to make the bill the special order for Friday next at one o'clock.

"Mr. COLLAMER. I move to amend the motion by saying Monday.

"The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to."

Mr. PUGH. I am satisfied, on looking at the rule, that it is necessary to offer my amendment before the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is in order now.

Mr. PUGH. The preamble recited the assembling of a convention in pursuance of an act of Congress, and many other things, which, in my judgment, are not literally correct, and I prefer that the preamble of the bill should follow a much safer precedent—the precedent in the case of the State of California. The preamble to that bill was in these words:

"Whereas, the people of California have presented a constitution, and ask admission into the Union, which constitution was submitted to Congress by the President of the United States, by message, dated February 13, 1850, which, on due examination, is found to be republican in its form of government."

Nothing was said as to compliance with an act of Congress. I move to strike out all after the word "whereas" in the preamble to this bill, and insert:

"The people of Minnesota have asked for admission into the Union as a State, and have submitted a constitution, which, on due examination, is found to be republican in its form of government."

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us have the preamble that is proposed to be stricken out read.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

"Whereas, an act of Congress was passed February 23, 1857, entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;' and whereas, the people of said Territory did, on the 29th day of August, 1857, by delegates elected for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which is republican in form, and was ratified and adopted by the people, at an election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, for that purpose, in pursuance of said act of Congress."

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to know what object there is in striking that out. Does it not recite the true history of the affair?

Mr. PUGH. I supposed, after the long discussion on the Minnesota case, that Senators were sufficiently aware that there never was any convention in Minnesota. In the first place, they erroneously construed the act of Congress. That required the convention to consist of twice as many delegates as there were representatives in the Territorial Legislature. They commenced by electing twice as many delegates as there were councilors and representatives in the Legislature. Then they never had a single body, but two bodies met in which persons claiming seats, contestants, sat. If you took the whole number together, you had more than the extraordinary construction would allow; and if you took either of them separately, you had not the convention which the act of Congress required. There never was any body corresponding to the convention required by the act of Congress.

Then they remitted the constitution to a vote of the people, but, as I have stated before, they expressly refused to allow any man to vote either for or against the constitution, unless he would vote for all the officers under it at the same time, and on the same ticket. Now, I want to know from my friend from Rhode Island, who has been criticising the vote in Kansas on the 21st of De-

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 94.

ember, what he says to that? It is because I am not satisfied that there ever was a legal convention, or that this vote is a vote which we could approve, after what we have heard of Kansas, that I propose to do as was done in the case of California. There is a constitution in Minnesota. It is in force. The people acquiesce under it; they are satisfied with it; and I treat it as a constitution, in force by the submission to the will of the people, although irregularly formed; and I would simply say, as in the California case, that they have presented a constitution to us, and it is republican in form; they have asked admission, and we allow them admission.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not know it was understood here that if a man asked what there was in a bill that was not correct in point of history, it followed that he must vindicate an error. The Senator asks what I will say to that? I say it is an error. I would strike that out; but is it necessary to strike out every truth that is there? That is what I wanted to know. If any part of the preamble is true, why do you want to strike it out?

Mr. PUGH. I do not think any of it is true literally. I do not mean that the Senator from Illinois has stated it wrongfully, but the language, literally construed, will not carry out the exact facts.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will give the Senator from Ohio an explanation of the preamble. The Committee on Territories found themselves divided on the very question of which he speaks, the history of this convention. It was irregular. We went through and agreed to a bill. Then the question was asked, how the preamble should be framed to be in exact accordance with the facts? One side made this suggestion, another this, and another this; until we agreed unanimously on all sides, that the preamble reported was precisely according to the facts, and was the only possible form of words we could agree upon. That is my only objection to the taking of the Senator's form. All sides agreed that this form of words did express the truth after a thorough investigation, that lasted about two weeks, and I hope, therefore, it will be retained.

Mr. MASON. Allow me to ask the chairman of the committee a question: whether the fact is not that there was no convention held in Minnesota? whether the fact is not that the gentlemen elected to the convention met in two bodies, organized themselves separately, and remained under a separate organization until each body adjourned sine die. I ask whether that is not the fact?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The facts are reported distinctly by the committee, and acknowledged on all sides to be correctly reported. Delegates were elected to one convention. There was a contest as to, I think, the seat of seven members. When they met, the two political parties quarreled as to the organization; one organized in the Council Chamber, and the other in the Representative Chamber. They went on as separate bodies, each claiming that it was the true, lawful, constitutional convention. When they had got about through forming a constitution, each for itself, they found that the constitutions they had framed were substantially the same. They appointed a committee of conference, and by that committee agreed upon a constitution, and each convention ratified the same constitution, word for word, sitting in two chambers, made it the act of both bodies, and thus united all the delegates upon the same instrument. That instrument was submitted to the people as the constitution of Minnesota, and ratified by over thirty thousand votes in the affirmative, and about five hundred votes in the negative. These are the substantial facts of the case.

Mr. MASON. If the facts be as the Senator from Illinois has stated them, how could it be truthfully, according to the facts recited in the preamble that this constitution (although I dare say it embodies the sense of the people) was the work of a convention organized under the enabling act, when in truth there was no convention at all, but two separate bodies, neither of them being a convention within the meaning of the act, who afterwards united by means of committees, but did never coalesce in a single body, and adjourned under a separate organization?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer the question. The delegates were elected under the enabling act. They came together at the capital on the day provided by the enabling act, and in pursuance of it. They then disputed as to the form of organization, and separated into two conventions, in fact, each claiming to be the true one. They were the delegates elected under the enabling act; and, sitting there, with a majority of the delegates thus elected, each body claimed that it was the true convention, and that the other was not. They both agreed upon the same constitution. The preamble recites that a convention of delegates did agree upon the constitution, without deciding which of them was the true convention; and both having agreed to it, the statement is strictly true; and it was submitted to the people. I care not about the form of words which may be used. My friend from Missouri, who is a member of the Committee on Territories, with me, who is very technical, and very able, too, on these points, suggested this form of words as obviating his objections; and others, taking opposite sides of the question, at last agreed to this form. I think the language agreed upon by the committee, who differed very materially on this point, knowing all the facts, may safely be taken. I have no objection, however, to any other form of words, provided it does not force some gentleman to vote against the admission who would otherwise vote for it. I would not care if there was no preamble at all.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask whether Minnesota will not be a State if we should not have any preamble to the bill at all?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose she would be a State, and just about as soon without a preamble as with one, and I would as lief have the bill without a preamble as with one, and I would as lief take the preamble of the Senator from Ohio as that of the committee. I do not care what the form is, so that it does not force any one to vote against the bill who would otherwise vote for it.

Mr. PUGH called for the yeas and nays on his amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. The Senate will pardon me in a single observation; I do not wish to prolong the debate. My object is simply to prevent a false precedent being set in this case. I do not think it is true that any convention was held in Minnesota. It is all idle to say, in my opinion, with due respect to the Senator from Illinois, that either of these bodies was the convention required by the act of Congress. There was a schism between the delegates, and, as I have said, a great number of those who constituted both bodies were never delegates chosen under the act of Congress. I do not mean merely the claimants—the seven contestants on each side, whose right to membership never was decided, but who sat in the respective conventions. I mean to say all that portion who claimed to be delegates representing twice the number of councilors in the Territorial Legislature, were not properly elected. We do not know, by any document that has been presented by the Committee on Territories, that all the persons in both these bodies assented to the constitution. It might be so, and then you might say that all the legally-elected delegates assented, and that the assent of the illegally-elected ones did not hurt; but we do not know by what vote it passed. We are told that a majority of each of these two bodies ratified the constitution; but how that majority was constituted in each instance we do not know. I assume, therefore, that the constitution derived no validity from the enabling act of Congress so far as the delegates were concerned, and I do not wish it to be put upon the Journals of Congress, to be brought up here in judgment hereafter, when we are deciding some other case, that we have decided that to be a compliance with the act of Congress; for, in my view, it is no compliance.

Then, as to the vote of the people, I will ask my friend from Illinois another question. Was he aware, at the time this bill was before the Committee on Territories, that there was a restriction upon the right of voting for or against the constitution, that nobody was allowed to vote for or against this constitution, except on the same ticket that he voted for State officers?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not understand now the precise point of the Senator.

Mr. PUGH. The section of the constitution which remits the constitution to a vote of the people, says that no man shall be allowed to vote for or against the constitution, except on the same ticket with his vote for State officers.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Read the clause in the precise form of language used by the convention.

Mr. PUGH. I have not the constitution here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I had the clause before me, and knew its precise language when the report was drawn.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator was aware of it, then.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask the Senator to read the clause, and put his construction on it.

Mr. PUGH. I have the constitution of Minnesota now. It is necessary for me to read the sixteenth and part of the eighteenth section of the schedule. Here is the sixteenth section:

"Upon the second Tuesday, the 13th day of October, 1857, an election shall be held for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, Governor, Lieutenant Governor, supreme and district judges, members of the Legislature, and all other officers designated in this constitution, and also for the submission of this constitution to the people for their adoption or rejection."

Then section eighteen:

"In voting for or against the adoption of this constitution, the words 'for constitution' or 'against constitution,' may be written or printed on the ticket of each voter; but no voter shall vote for or against this constitution on a separate ballot from that cast by him for officers to be elected at said election under this constitution."

My friend said he was aware of that provision at the time he reported this bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Clearly; we had it before us and discussed it.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator means, then, to be understood in the language of the preamble, that a submission in this manner was a proper submission to ratification by the people.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall answer the Senator very carefully. I cannot stand up to be catechised yes or no, on each question. On that I tell him, unhesitatingly, yes; but I do not understand this mode of debate.

Mr. PUGH. It was not my object to provoke any controversy with the Senator, or to entrap him in any manner; but he stated that the committee had carefully examined every provision of the constitution, and every word of the preamble; that it had all been weighed; [Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.] but I did suppose, to be frank with the Senator, that this provision had escaped his attention, for it escaped mine until a late point of the discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The only point I objected to was putting one question and then another, without giving time for an explanation to accompany the answer.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator may give it now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will wait until you get through.

Mr. PUGH. The preamble to the bill asserts that this constitution was submitted to and ratified by the people. It was ratified in the manner I have stated. I do not pretend, individually, to pass any judgment on such a ratification. If I put any question to the Senator which seemed to him at all offensive or disposed to mislead him or treat him unfairly, I beg his pardon, but I propose to ignore the disputed question by simply taking the case of the State of California. She had a constitution formed by a convention and ratified by the people; but a serious question arose as to the regularity of the convention, and as to the legality of the vote; and the wise men who framed the compromise of 1850; ignored the question and adopted very much the form which I have proposed here. It seems to me we had better avoid these questions, for they will come up hereafter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have only a word or two to say in reply to my friend from Ohio. If there was anything in my response to him that seemed uncourteous, I will say to him very frankly that I did not mean it, and I did not understand his language to bear any unfriendly or any unkind construction to me. In regard to this mode of submission, I think it was free, fair, and complete. The convention provided that the constitution should be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection; that every voter should be allowed to vote for the constitution or against the constitution, and on the same ballot should vote for State officers; but they could put just such State officers on the ballots as they pleased, only they must be on the same ballot. They put a Democratic ticket on it, or the Republican ticket, or left both off and put on other names; but whatever vote they gave on State officers was on one ballot. This did not control the mode in which they should vote, whether for the constitution or against it, nor whether it should be for or against this ticket or that ticket for State officers. In other words, under that mode of voting, every man was left perfectly free to vote as he pleased, for or against the constitution, or for or against either ticket for State officers. As I said before, the ratification was by a majority of over thirty thousand one way, and only five hundred votes the other way.

Now, a word as to the preamble. This preamble states:

"Whereas, an act of Congress was passed February 26, 1857, entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.'"

It thus far recites a fact undeniably true; and then goes on:

"And whereas the people of said Territory did, on the 29th day of August, 1857, by delegates elected for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government which is republican in form."

There is not a question of this being true. There is no doubt that, by delegates elected for the purpose, they framed a constitution. The preamble does not state whether the delegates met in one body or two bodies, but that the delegates were elected for that purpose and framed a constitution. The original draught contained the words, "delegates assembled in convention in pursuance of the enabling act;" but, on motion of the Senator from Missouri, those words were stricken out, so as to leave it in its present form, saying simply that the constitution was framed by delegates elected for that purpose. Can anybody dispute that?

What next? The preamble next recites that the constitution was "ratified and adopted by the people at an election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, for that purpose, in pursuance of said act of Congress." That is, the election was held on the ratification of the constitution in pursuance of the act of Congress. There is no dispute on that point. My friend from Missouri and myself, who mainly differed in regard to the facts connected with this case, agreed that the election on the ratification of the constitution was in pursuance of the act of Congress. I thought the assembling of the delegates was in substantial pursuance of it, but he thought not, and my friend from Vermont thought not, and hence the committee struck out those words.

Mr. COLLAMER. Allow me to say that the fact is that those two gentlemen were at issue about it, and in order to settle the difficulty, I proposed to strike out those words.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I believe that is it. The Senator from Vermont moved to strike out the words which I have mentioned, and we agreed to it. We concluded that everything now contained in the preamble is literally true. All facts which we could not agree upon, we omitted for that reason, and the preamble is perfectly acceptable to me. I would not care if it was stricken out altogether; I would not care if the preamble of the Senator from Ohio was inserted. I do not deem it worthy of a contest, but when a charge is made that the committee have reported a preamble that is not true, I deem it necessary to say thus much.

Mr. PUGH. Did the Senator understand me to say that? I said that I did not think it conveyed, by the language of the preamble, a true impression. I did not mean to impugn any member of the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not mean that the Senator used the word "untrue" in any offensive sense; but he meant that we had employed language which was not historically true, or justified by the events purported to be recited.

Mr. PUGH. Exactly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I merely wished to vindicate the committee, and show that they had not acted hastily; that they had not done this inadvertently; but each line in this preamble was criticised at the time, and very keenly and severely criticised by my friend from Missouri. Though I thought his criticisms were not quite justified by the original language, yet when the Senator from Vermont suggested that we should strike it out, I yielded to his suggestion, and agreed to strike it out. The committee agreed unanimously on this form, and I was in hopes that we could all agree to it, and close the controversy.

Mr. GREEN. I think it proper to remark that the statement made by the Senator from Illinois conforms precisely to my recollection. If the employment of these last words in the preamble, "in pursuance of said act of Congress," is to be applied to all that is recited in the former part of the preamble, it is wrong, and I should be opposed to it; but if it is simply to be applied to the election on the constitution, when it was formed, I have no objection to it; and as it is a mere matter of construction, to avoid all difficulty, I propose to strike out those words, for it makes no difference either way.

Mr. PUGH. Strike them out, and I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GREEN. I suggest that proposition, for it makes no difference either way, and that will prevent any misconception hereafter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I will move to strike out the words "in pursuance of said act of Congress."

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires the consent of the Senate to allow the amendment to be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois now moves to amend the preamble by striking out the words "in pursuance of said act of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Before the final vote is taken, I desire to say a few words in explanation of the vote I shall give. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing at length any of the provisions either of the bill or of the constitution submitted to us. I intend to vote against the admission of Minnesota upon the simple and broad ground that in my humble judgment its constitution contains provisions directly at variance with the Constitution of the United States. I am opposed to it because it involves a principle, in my humble judgment, directly in conflict, not only with the Constitution of the United States, but with the rights of the southern States. It claims the constitutional power to confer the right of suffrage upon a class of inhabitants not recognized by the Constitution of the United States. It involves a principle which comes directly in conflict with the principles of a party that I have the honor to represent on this floor, whose great leading doctrine is directly in conflict with this principle; and I should be unjust to myself and recreant to the duty that is devolved upon me, if I did not vindicate the principles of that party, to a slight extent, at least, in giving the reasons why I vote against this bill. I am not now referring particularly to the bill for the admission of Minnesota at all; because, really, that bill is a matter of very little importance to me; but I intend to vote against the admission of the State with this constitution which she has sent here. Its seventh article, in regard to the elective franchise, declares:

"SECTION 1. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and in the State for four months next preceeding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, in the election district of which he shall at the time have been for ten days a resident, for all offices that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people:

"1st. White citizens of the United States.

"2d. White persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intention to become citizens, conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization.

"3d. Persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization.

"4th. Persons of Indian blood residing in this State, who have adopted the language, customs, and habits of civilization, after an examination before any district court of the State, in such manner as may be provided by law, and shall have been pronounced by said court capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State."

"Sec. 7. Every person who, by the provisions of this article, shall be entitled to vote at any election, shall be eligible to any office which now is, or hereafter shall be, elective by the people in the district wherein he shall have resided thirty days previous to such election, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, or in the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Now, sir, the ground that I take, and the ground taken by the party that I have the honor to represent, is that alien suffrage and squatter sovereignty must be repudiated. Having asserted these principles before the people of my own State, and being prepared to vindicate them here, I cannot give my sanction to the admission of a State with a constitution containing so clear an infraction of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, as that article contains; for if you admit the right of aliens, not naturalized, to take part in your elections—men who really cannot claim the protection of the Government; who have no right to come here and petition for a redress of grievances until the mantle of citizenship has been put upon them, in accordance with the laws of Congress and the Constitution of the United States—you permit that class of individuals in this country to control directly the action of Congress, and, perhaps, the destiny of this nation. Sir, I know that I am taking very broad ground in making this declaration—I know that I am assuming much in this body when I undertake to say that people who are not citizens of the United States have no right to vote by the suffrage which may be conferred upon them by the action of a State government; but it has been contended on this floor, and ably and strongly by some of the giant intellects of former days, that the principle on which I act in this matter is a correct one. We are now in some degree reaping the fruits of the loose and cheap right of suffrage which has been conferred upon the people in this country. There has been of late a power aggregating itself in one section of the country upon the adverse proposition to that which I have stated here, which, if not checked, if not controlled, will before long sweep from us that right and that equality which we of the southern States hold in this Union.

Upon a former occasion, I said that I was opposed to squatter sovereignty, because it disturbed the political equilibrium that had existed between the States, on a strict construction and enforcement of the guarantees of the Constitution of the United States. I opposed it because it opened the door to an unequal contest with persons who came here and claimed, through their Representatives who had a voice in Congress, the right to administer this Government, and to direct its policy directly in opposition to the conceded principles of the Constitution when it was framed. When the Constitution was framed the southern States of this Confederacy were upon a footing of perfect equality with all the States of the Union; and my desire has been to do nothing to destroy that equality.

Mr. President, when Congress has exercised its authority by passing a uniform law of naturalization, it excludes the right of exercising a similar authority on the part of the State; and to suppose that the States could do this would make this provision of the Constitution of the United States nugatory. The power has been given to the Congress of the United States to establish a uniform rule of naturalization for the express, simple purpose of protecting the minority in this country from an aggregation of power that might be the result of allowing States to hold out inducements to emigrants. It was to protect us against that interpolation or subversion of the principles of this Government, which will necessarily creep into it by the introduction of new members of the Government, imported from foreign countries, and brought here directly to carry out sectional purposes and for sectional objects only. To suppose that a State could make an alien a citizen, or confer on him the right of voting, would give him a direct and broad control in this Government. A man votes for Representatives in the other branch of Congress in accordance with the laws of the State in which he resides; and, if you allow aliens to vote for members of Congress, they may control your legislation here, and introduce a system of policy entirely at variance with that upon which the Government was originally formed.

Now, sir, in presenting the views that I have submitted to the Senate, I am not standing alone. In vindication of this principle which I assert, I bring to my support the doctrine proclaimed here by one of the most distinguished Senators whose voice has ever been heard in this Hall. I will, by permission of the Senate, read upon this point the views of no less a man than John C. Calhoun, who, standing here in vindication of the rights of the South, and for the principles of this Government, foreseeing the dangerous consequences which might result, in 1836 gave the warning not only to the Senate, but to the country, of the dangers that would result from this cheap suffrage which was being bestowed, or attempted to be bestowed, upon the States then coming into the Union. Mr. Calhoun said:

"When Congress has exercised its authority by passing a uniform law of naturalization, (as it has,) it excludes the right of exercising a similar authority on the part of the State. To suppose that the States could pass naturalization acts of their own after Congress had passed a uniform law of naturalization, would be to make the provision of the Constitution nugatory."

He said further—I quote from his speech on the Michigan bill in 1836—

"To suppose that a State can make an alien a citizen of the State, or, to present the question more specifically, can confer on him the right of voting, would involve the absurdity of giving him a direct and immediate control over the action of the General Government, from which he has no right to claim the protection, and to which he has no right to present a petition. That the full force of the absurdity may be felt, it must be borne in mind that every department of the General Government is either directly or indirectly under the control of the voters in the several States. The Constitution wisely provides that the voters for the most numerous branch of the Legislature in the several States shall vote for members of the House of Representatives; and, as the members of this body are chosen by the Legislatures of the States, and the presidential electors either by the Legislatures or voters in the several States, it follows, as I have stated, that the action of the General Government is either directly or indirectly under the control of the voters in the several States. Now, admit that a State may confer the right of voting on all aliens, and it will follow, as a necessary consequence, that we might have among our constituents persons who have not the right to claim the protection of the Government, or to present a petition to it."

This, to my mind, is conclusive; it is an argument binding with such force on my judgment, that I never can yield the principle. But Mr. Calhoun went further in discussing this question, and I beg that I may be allowed to quote further from him, because surely I think that his arguments will have more force and more effect, when fairly put before the country, and fairly understood by the Senate, than anything I can say, or anything that I can offer. I gladly accept his principles and his doctrines as a text, and I am willing to abide by them. They are so entirely in accordance with the views, principles, and doctrines of the party I am representing here, that I am rejoiced to find that I have so able an advocate for the humble views that I am submitting to the Senate. In speaking of the object which the framers of the Constitution had in conferring this power, Mr. Calhoun said:

"In conferring this power the framers of the constitution must have had two objects in view: one to prevent competition between the States in holding out inducements for the emigration of foreigners; and the other, to prevent their improper influence over the General Government, through such States as might naturalize foreigners, and could confer on them the right of exercising the elective franchise, before they could be sufficiently informed of the nature of our institutions or were interested in their preservation."

That, sir, is the great principle on which I stand. It is in defense of that right that my own party has in its platform laid down the doctrine that aliens not naturalized shall not exercise the rights of American freemen. There is a wide difference between privileges granted and rights claimed. I am only contending against the right of a State to confer that power which has a direct control not only over the legislation in these Halls but that has a power to control the presidential election itself. I hope I may be permitted, in illustration of this view, to quote still further from Mr. Calhoun:

"Both of these objects would be defeated, if the States may confer on aliens the right of voting and the other privileges belonging to citizens. On that supposition, it would be almost impossible to conceive what good could be obtained, or evil prevented, by conferring the power on Congress. The power would be perfectly nugatory. A State might hold out every improper inducement to emigration, as freely as if the power did not exist; and might confer on the alien all the political privileges belonging to a native-born citizen; not only to the great injury of the Government of the State, but to an improper control over the Government of the Union. To illustrate what I have said: suppose the dominant party in New York, finding political power about to depart from them, should, to maintain their ascendancy, extend the right of suffrage to the thousands of aliens of every language, and from every portion of the world, that annually pour into our great emporium: how deeply might the destiny of the whole Union be affected by such a measure. It might, in fact, place the control over the General Government in the hands of those who know nothing of our institutions, and are indifferent as to the interests of the country. New York gives about one sixth of the electoral votes in the choice of President and Vice President; and it is well known that her political institutions keep the State nearly equally divided into two great political parties. The addition of a few thousand votes, either way, might turn the scale, and the electors might, in fact, owe their election, on the supposition, to the votes of unnaturalized foreigners. The presidential election might depend on the electoral vote of the State, and a President be chosen in reality by them; that is, they might give us a king."

Mr. President, I think there is a clear illustration of the dangers that are likely to result to this Government from this lax administration of this power. I think, if the political equilibrium of this Government is to be maintained, it is only to be maintained by enforcing the guarantees of the Constitution, which was a compromise made between the States of the North and the States of the South, for the protection of those rights which are now so grossly assailed and so greatly invaded. I do not desire to prolong this debate any further. I rose simply for the purpose of explaining the reasons why I shall give my vote against the admission of Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Before the Senator from Maryland closes, in order to understand rightly a very important question involved in his argument, I wish to propound an inquiry to him. The Congress of the United States, having the power, under the Constitution, pass a uniform rule of naturalization. Do I understand him as contending that when a man has been made a citizen of the United States by the naturalization law of Congress, any State into which he may emigrate is compelled to allow him to vote?

Mr. KENNEDY. If I understand the gentleman, I have no hesitation in answering his question. If a man has been naturalized in conformity with the law of Congress, he clearly has the right then to vote in any State.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then any State into which he goes is compelled to let him vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. In conformity always with the municipal laws of the State; but he must be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Has not each State the power to fix the qualifications of its voters? Has it not a right to impose any prohibition it pleases? Some of the States of this Confederacy have required a man to be a property-holder before he could exercise the elective franchise. If a State cannot permit a man to vote until he is a citizen, is not the converse of the proposition equally true—that, when he is a citizen, no State can prevent him from voting? I say this, not for the purpose of confusing the Senator, or interfering with his argument, but in order to be instructed and informed on this subject; for I desire to understand his views. If it be true that, when an individual is once made a citizen of the United States, any State into which he goes is compelled to allow him to vote, what will be the consequence of such a principle? A free negro coming here from Africa could be naturalized, if your laws allowed it. As the naturalization laws now stand, none but white persons can be naturalized; but suppose those laws should be amended by striking out the word "white:" could you not make every negro who should emigrate from Africa to the United States a citizen? and, on being made a citizen, would not the southern States, according to this doctrine, be compelled to let him vote? What would become of southern rights and interests under such a system? Free negro emigrants from Africa, being naturalized, might flood the southern States.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the gentleman will allow me to go on, I shall come directly to that point. It is to protect the rights of the southern States that I take the position which I have announced. I say a majority of the people of this country, through their State action, should not have power to direct and control the legislation of Congress by violating the naturalization laws of the country. The distinguished gentleman from whose speech I have quoted, and whose argument is complete on this subject, says on the very point upon which the Senator has put the interrogatory:

"But, to pass to the question immediately before us. This, as I have stated, does not involve the question whether a State can make an alien a citizen; but whether Congress has a right to prescribe the qualifications to be possessed by those who shall vote for members of a convention to form a constitution for Michigan? Reason and precedent concur that Congress has the right. It has, as I have stated, been exercised in every similar case. If the right does not exist in Congress, it exists nowhere. A Territory, until it becomes a State, is a dependent community, and possesses no political rights but what are derived from the community on which it depends. Who shall or shall not exercise political power? and what shall be the qualifications possessed by them? and how shall they be appointed? are all questions to be determined by the paramount community; and, in the case under consideration, to be determined by Congress, which has the right, under the Constitution, to prescribe all necessary rules for the government of the Territories, not inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution. This very bill, in fact, admits the right. It prescribes that the people of Michigan shall vote for the convention to form her constitution on becoming a State. It belongs to the Territory of Michigan (she is not yet a State) to determine who shall vote for the members of the convention, this attempt on our part to designate who shall be the voters would be an unconstitutional interference with her right, and ought to be objected to, as such, by those opposed to our views. But if, on the other hand, the view I take be correct, that the right belongs to Congress, and not to the Territory, the loose, vague, and indefinite manner in which the voters are described in the bill affords a decisive reason for its recommitment. I ask, who are the people of Michigan? Taken in the ordinary sense, it means everybody, of every age, of every sex, of every complexion, white, black, or red, aliens as well as citizens. Regarded in this light, to pass this bill would sanction the principle that Congress may authorize an alien to vote, or confer that high privilege on the runaway slaves from Kentucky, Virginia, or elsewhere; and thus elevate them to the dignity of citizens, enjoying under the Constitution all the rights and privileges in the States of the Union which appertain to citizenship."

Again, he said:

"My colleague insists that to deny the right for which he contends would be to confer on Congress the right of prescribing who should or should not be entitled to vote in the State, and exercise the other privileges belonging to citizens; and portrayed in strong language the dangers to the rights of the States from such authority. If his views are correct in this respect, the danger would indeed be imminent; but I cannot concur in their correctness. Under the view which I have taken, the authority of Congress is limited to the simple point of passing uniform laws of naturalization, or, as I have shown, simply to remove alienage. To this extent it may clearly go, under the Constitution; and it is no less clear that it cannot go an inch beyond, without palpably transcending its powers and violating the Constitution."

That is the only principle I have stated. It is to confine the right to vote to persons who have the rights of citizens, not only in one State, but over the whole land. It is to prevent an aggregation of power in a class of people who cannot claim the protection of this Government, who have no right to petition Congress for a redress of grievances. It is to prevent the minority of the people of these States from being overcome by a power of this character, aggregated for the purpose of mere sectional advantage. It is so directly in conflict with all the principles that I believe to be essential for the permanency of a free Government like ours; it is so directly inimical to the permanency of the principles of the Constitution itself, and to the enforcement of the guarantees of the Constitution, that I have thought proper to oppose it, and for these reasons I have entered my protest. I place my protest upon the record. I cannot recognize the principle either in a Territory or in a State, for the reasons I have quoted, of allowing aliens, not citizens, not entitled to the protection of the Government, not entitled to the right of petitioning this Congress for redress of grievances, to control me, or to control my State, and to break up that equality by which alone this Union can be preserved. For these reasons I shall vote against the admission of Minnesota with her present constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is not my object to consume the time of the Senate; or to delay the passage of the bill; but there is one point which has been suggested on which I have pretty well made up my mind, and if I am in error, I desire to be corrected. It is due in sincerity to the Senator from Maryland, that I should enter my protest against the doctrine enunciated by him on this occasion. I have no doubt about his sincerity and the correctness of his purpose in the great objects which he wishes to accomplish; but I think if the doctrine he has announced be sanctioned and obtain an ascendancy in this Government, the very idea of State sovereignty will be at an end, and the existence of the State governments will be set at naught. He has read from pretty high authority as to the qualifications of voters in the States, but there is still higher authority, in my opinion, and it is made by the Constitution, the highest authority in this Government, the Supreme Court of the United States, which has decided this question. My mind is influenced quite as much by that able, that distinguished, that discreet, that profound court, as by the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, though he was a very great man. The Supreme Court has decided that the qualification of a voter in a sovereign State is a matter to be fixed by the State, and not to be controlled by the Congress of the United States in the passage of naturalization laws. If it be true that the Congress of the United States can fix the qualification of a voter in a State, where is your State sovereignty? Where does sovereignty begin according to the theory of this Government? Is it not with the people? If Congress can fix the qualifications of a voter in a State, does it not control the sovereignty of the State? If you can fix the qualifications to entitle a man to go to the ballot-box, from which law and order emanate, from which the State itself emanates, is not that taking control of the sovereignty of the State into the hands of the Congress of the United States. If it be true that Congress can fix the qualification of a voter in a State, of course the moment Congress, by making a man a citizen, qualifies him for a voter, it follows, his qualification being fixed, that every State is bound, under the Constitution, to let him vote. To this I cannot consent.

The courts have decided that free negroes are not citizens. Now suppose you should pass a naturalization law authorizing free negroes to become citizens of the United States: is there any one here in the Senate of the United States who will assert, or who, having asserted, will sustain on sound reason the proposition that a State could not pass a law excluding a free negro from the ballot-box, because you had made him a citizen of the United States? Suppose a State requires a voter to be a property holder; has it not a right to do so? I mention this merely to test the principle. I am myself in favor of the fullest extension of the elective franchise on correct principles. But take your own State, Mr. President, (Mr. Bices in the chair,) my native State: how long has it been since you have seen citizens coming up to the ballot-box voting at one poll for Senators by property holders, and all the citizens voting at another poll for the Commons? They were all citizens of the United States; and if this doctrine be true, North Carolina had no right, either by her constitution or her laws, to fix any qualification preventing a citizen from voting.

The Senator from Maryland wants to purify the ballot-box; a great object with him is to restrain foreigners, to require them to live in the country a certain number of years, and be familiar with the nature and character and genius of the Government, before becoming citizens. With a view of purifying the ballot-box he is now striking at foreigners; but suppose the opposite idea to that which he entertains should obtain the ascendancy; what then? If we can require them to stay here five years or twenty years before being naturalized, can we not allow them to be naturalized in twenty-five minutes or in twenty-five days? Can we tell where a desire for ascendancy may carry a dominant party? It may be the policy of a party in the ascendancy at one time to make men who come to the United States citizens in twenty-five days after they get here. It may be the policy of a party in power at some time to encourage the immigration of natives of Africa, to naturalize them, to make them citizens, and push them into the States, to take charge of the ballot-box throughout the South. I protest against this doctrine. It is a blow at State sovereignty; it is the assertion of a power that will sweep away forever every vestige of State sovereignty. It ought to be repudiated and put down. I care not whether it comes in the name of Know Nothingism, or Americanism, or under any other plausible name, in which you think proper to present it. It is a heresy, in my honest opinion, to talk about the Federal Government fixing the qualification of a voter in a State.

When you turn to the Constitution of the United States, do you not find that it proceeds on the very idea that it is a matter within the control of the States to fix the qualifications of voters? The Constitution provides that members of the House of Representatives shall be elected by those persons in each State who are qualified by the laws of the State to vote for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature; thus conceding the exclusive power of the States to fix the qualification of voters within their limits. We make the issue upon Minnesota or any other State; but do we not see where the doctrine would carry us? In all doubtful questions, in the language of the illustrious Jefferson, let us pursue principles. There is a great principle of State sovereignty involved in this matter; let us pursue it. What becomes, let me ask, of the resolutions of the Old Dominion of 1798 and 1799, when she took bold ground against the alien law? Was it not because that was an assertion of power on the part of the Federal Government to go inside of a State and interfere with rights of citizenship secured under State authority? One of the main points covered by those resolutions was a denial of the exercise of the power to go inside of a sovereign State and interfere with the privileges conferred upon its citizens by the States. How can we object to admitting a State into the Union because she chooses to allow foreigners who have lived there six or twelve months to vote? If I were in a body fixing the qualification of voters, I would allow none to vote in the United States, in the States or Territories, until they were citizens; but that is a question to be fixed by each State for itself. My own State, in her constitution, requires all her voters to be citizens of the United States; but we claim the power to fix that matter, and deny it to the Federal Government. We say that Congress has no such right; that it belongs to us, not to you.

I do not want to consume time or protract this discussion, or keep Minnesota out of the Union; but I repeat again, if this doctrine be carried out, and the Opposition in principle get the ascendancy, they might, if they were so disposed—I do not impute it to them—change the naturalization laws from five years to one month, or six months, or as soon as the process could be gone through with, and allow every free negro in the United States, every emigrant from Africa, to be made a citizen; and he being a citizen, the States would be compelled to admit him to the ballot-box, and allow him to exercise the elective franchise. I do not want such a doctrine sent to the country seemingly tacitly indorsed by the Senate of the United States. I merely got up to enter my protest against it.

So far as the view of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, on this matter is concerned, I think it was one of those peculiar crotchets into which his mind fell. He was a great man, a distinguished man, a great logician, and could lay down propositions, and argue from premises to conclusions. His conclusions were clear; and from his premises no one could resist his conclusions. But I think this was one of the peculiarities of his mind. The courts have said differently. The opinion of the Supreme Court is entitled to at least as much respect, I think, as that of Mr. Calhoun. That is made the supreme arbiter by the Constitution of the United States, and it has decided and settled the question that the State is the competent authority to fix the qualification of a voter.

Mr. MASON. I think the hour of adjournment has arrived; and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PUGH. I hope we shall pass this bill. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 6, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. F. SWENTZEL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to have the Journal corrected. The Speaker will remember that on yesterday, when the resolution was introduced in reference to the deficiency bill, an amendment was made limiting the debate to thirty minutes to each member, which I objected to because it sought to change a standing rule of this House, and was not germane to the resolution pending. I want the latter fact stated in the Journal. The Chair decided that it was germane, and he was sustained by the House.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is, that the gentleman excepted to the decision made by the Speaker upon the first ground, and said nothing with respect to its being germane or otherwise.

Mr. SEWARD. The Chair put its decision upon the ground that it was germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decided.

Mr. SEWARD. The resolution was to rescind an order of the House, and, in effect, to establish a new one. I think the Speaker's decision was wrong.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want to have inserted the words, "and that it was not germane?"

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. Hickey, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate to the act to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers, for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States two additional regiments of volunteers.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of person and property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further consideration of House bill No. 306, (the deficiency bill,) be postponed one week, in order to obtain information called for in reference to that bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I imagine that information is upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. It has not yet reached the Speaker's table, but it will be in the House to-day, from an intimation given to the Chair.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. There are several gentlemen asking me to give way, and I must decline to do so.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW YORK.

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman allow me to present resolutions of the Legislature of my State, for reference?

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection to that. Mr. FENTON then, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, in relation to the muskets furnished by the Federal Government to the military forces of the State; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. ROBBINS, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, asking the passage of a law restoring to that State the ports of Jersey City and Camden, and also to establish ports of entry at Tom's River, and Atlantic City; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The question was then taken on Mr. LETCHER's motion, and it was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Boccock in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the committee last rose on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RITCHIE,] who, according to usage, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. RITCHIE. I do not desire to address the committee. I yield the floor to any other gentleman who desires to occupy it.

No member sought the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman desires to debate the bill, the Chair is ready to receive a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to enter into another discussion of the deficiency bill; but on Friday last, when this bill was under consideration, there were some erroneous statements made with respect to the cost of the maintenance of the Army. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] made the mistake of charging to the cost of the Army all of the expenditures made under the direction of the War Department. Since that time, sir, I have obtained from the office of the Register of the Treasury a statement of the actual cost for the support of the Army for the last two fiscal years; but yesterday, when I attempted to present that statement to the committee, the gentleman from Illinois called me to order. I have now sought the floor for the purpose of giving the precise sums. The gentleman from Illinois spoke also of the expenses of the Navy Department, and said that the expenses of that Department had been swelled from $9,000,000 to $19,000,000 within the few years last past. The gentleman was equally unfortunate in his statement in regard to that Department, because, under the head of the expenditures of the Navy Department, all the amounts were charged—as appears from the tabular statement to which he referred—which were expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, whether expended for the support of the Navy or for the transportation of the United States mails in mail steamers, (for some of the contracts for that service are made by the Secretary of the Navy,) and for many other objects.

I have also a statement here of the expenditures for the support of the Navy proper for the last two fiscal years, furnished me by the Register of the Treasury. The letter of the Register of the Treasury, and those statements, are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE,
April 3, 1858.

SIR: In compliance with your oral request of this date, I herewith inclose statements showing the expenses of the United States Navy and Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1856, and 1857.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. BIGGER,

Register.

Hon. JOHN S. PHELPS, House of Representatives.

Statement showing the expense of supporting the United States Navy, during the years ending June 30, 1856, and June 30, 1857.

Expenses.	Navy.	Marine Corps.
Year ending June 30, 1856.	$7,024,422 42	$488,881 28

	$14,075,130 10	$992,552 21

Statement showing the expenses of supporting the United States Army during the year ending June 30, 1856, and 1857, including Army proper, Military Academy, ordnance and equipment of the militia, armories, arsenals, &c.

Expenses.	Amount.
Year ending June 30, 1856.....	$13,577,539 61
Year ending June 30, 1857.....	13,802,860 76
	$27,380,400 37

F. BIGGER, Register.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
REGISTER'S OFFICE, April 3, 1858.

If any gentleman will refer to the annual statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Government, he will find that the expenditures for the construction of military roads, expenditures for the construction of forts, for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and for the settlement of private claims directed to be paid by the Secretary of War, are included in the aggregate amount of $19,000,000 expended by the Secretary of War. And so with reference to the Navy.

One word more. The gentleman from Illinois seemed to suppose that the statement which he had of miscellaneous expenditures embraced the miscellaneous expenditures made under the direction of the Secretary of War and of the Secretary of the Navy. That is not so. It embraced those miscellaneous appropriations which were formerly included in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and in private bills, which are to be settled under the direction of other Departments than those of the Secretaries of War and the Navy, and which were expended under the direction of the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury. This, sir, is all I desire to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, on Friday last when this bill was up for consideration, I was induced to make a statement in order to correct an erroneous impression which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] seemed to labor under in relation to the purchase of horses. I find that I was myself led into some inaccuracies in the statement which I then made. I felt, however, that it was due to the distinguished head of the quartermaster's department that the facts should be placed properly and correctly before the country. I took it upon myself, therefore, to call upon him for certain information, but on that occasion he was not present. I then addressed him a note, and he has returned an answer in writing, which gives so fully that information which is necessary to a proper understanding of this subject, that I shall be obliged to you if you will have it read. It contains a statement of the basis of the action of that department, and the law under which that action is justified. I ask that the paper may be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1858.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of this morning in relation to the manner of purchasing of horses for the public service, I have the honor to state that it has been the practice generally heretofore, to send officers of the quartermaster's department, or officers of the mounted corps, to make the purchases; but this can be done only where we have money to pay for them. The heavy expenditures in 1857, as well before as after the close of the fiscal year on the 30th of June, on account of the operations against Utah, for which no appropriations had been made by Congress, had left this branch of the public service without funds by the last of January of the present year.

On the 24th of December last, I had obtained the data on which I was enabled to make an estimate for the deficiencies in the appropriations for the present fiscal year. That estimate was made for the Army as it then was, without allowing a cent for any increase of the force for Utah; and it amounted to $3,700,000. Early in January, I was informed by the Secretary of War that an additional force of thirty-five hundred men would be sent to Utah, as well as recruits to fill the companies there, and he required an estimate of the increased expense; and as the estimate for deficiencies had not been sent to Congress he returned it to me, and requested that I should include the whole in a single estimate. I submitted the consolidated estimate on the 6th of January, amounting to $6,700,000. On the 12th of January, I received from the headquarters of Lieutenant General Scott a circular dated the 11th, directing the movements to be made, and the arrangements to be carried out, for the reinforcement and supply of the army operating in Utah. The appropriations being exhausted, I called the attention of the Secretary of War verbally to the provisions of the sixth section of an act of Congress, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," approved the 1st of May, 1820, which gives authority to the Secretary of War, when appropriations fail, to make the contracts necessary to carry on the service. Perceiving no movement in Congress in regard to the appropriation for deficiencies, and feeling myself responsible for the efficient performance of the duties of the department confided to me, connected with the service ordered by the General-in-Chief, I, on the 17th of February, addressed the Secretary of War a written communication asking his attention to the provisions of the act above referred to, an extract from which is inclosed.

On the 2d of March, I was detailed as a member of a general court-martial directed to convene for the trial of an officer at Carlisle, on the 10th of that month. Before leaving Washington for the court-martial, I considered it alike due to myself and to the public service to invite the attention of the Secretary of War again to the act of Congress before referred to; and accordingly I addressed him a written communication on the 5th of March, an extract from which is inclosed.

I left on the 8th for Carlisle, to attend the court. During my absence the Secretary of War, acting, as I understand, under the authority conferred upon him by the act before mentioned, gave orders for the making of contracts for the purchase of horses, mules, and grain. A contract has been made under these orders by Captain Van Vliet, for fifteen hundred horses. These horses are to be inspected by cavalry officers, who have been sent to the proper points for this purpose. No other contracts have yet been reported under the instructions given by the Secretary of War.

That for grain has not been made, as the quartermaster at St. Louis reports to me, because there is a difference between him and the bidders about the price.

I believe myself that the Secretary of War was bound either to authorize contracts for that which was necessary to the service, or to abandon the operations against Utah.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP,

Quartermaster General.

Hon. W. L. UNDERWOOD, House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish now to have read the general circular from the Lieutenant General of the United States to the quartermaster's department, which constitutes the basis of the estimates for the Utah expedition.

The circular was read, as follows:

[Circular.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
January 11, 1858.

The General-in-Chief with the sanction of the War Department, issues the following instructions, to be promptly executed by the chiefs of the respective staff departments, in connection with General Orders No. 1, of the 8th instant:

1. According to said order, the troops to be put in march this spring to reinforce the army of Utah, from Fort Leavenworth, &c., filled up to the maximum standard, will be, as follows:

	Officers.	Men.	Aggregate.
First cavalry.....	35	855	890
Two companies second dragoons.....	6	170	176
Two light companies second artillery.....	8	172	180
Sixth infantry, (seven companies).....	25	592	617
Sixth infantry, (one company at Fort Kearny).....	3	84	87
Sixth infantry, (two companies at Fort Laramie).....	6	168	174
Seventh infantry, (eight companies).....	28	676	704
Seventh infantry, (two companies at Fort Laramie).....	6	168	174
Staff officers.....	16	...	16
Total.....	133	2,885	3,018

2. The force now in Utah under Colonel Johnston, (eight companies second dragoons, fifth and tenth infantry, Phelps's light battery fourth artillery, and Reno's heavy battery,) if up to the maximum standard, would amount to one hundred and eighteen officers, two thousand four hundred and seventy men; two thousand five hundred and eighty-eight aggregate. It is estimated that these troops require eight hundred and fifty recruits, which number will be put at Fort Leavenworth to accompany the reinforcement, with forty-four officers.

3. The entire force to be provided for on the march is one hundred and seventy-seven officers, three thousand seven hundred and thirty-five men; aggregate three thousand nine hundred and twelve. The whole army of Utah (reinforcement included) to be supplied with subsistence, is two hundred and fifty-one officers, five thousand three hundred and fifty-five men; five thousand six hundred and six aggregate.

4. All disposable recruits will be put in march for Fort Leavenworth as early in the spring as practicable. The number required for the seventh infantry can be sent to Jefferson Barracks from the nearer rendezvous.

5. The troops to march from the points indicated must be supplied with three months' subsistence for consumption on the route, and one year's supply for the entire army of Utah will be sent with them. A reserve supply of eight months to be thrown forward to Fort Laramie before the setting in of winter. Three days' bacon and four days' fresh beef in the week will be issued. Beef cattle to be sent on the hoof. In addition to the ordinary ration, there will be allowed two extra rations per week of tea and sugar, and two of dehydrated vegetables.

6. The eight companies seventh infantry will halt at Jefferson Barracks only a sufficient time to receive recruits and equipments, and then proceed to Fort Leavenworth for transportation and subsistence.

7. A full complement of disbursing and medical officers will be immediately designated by the chiefs of the respective departments concerned; the senior in each case to be an officer of rank and experience, and also an officer of ordnance and two of topographical engineers.

8. Besides the necessary trains and supplies, the quartermaster's department will procure fifty tents of Sibley's pattern; also such number of storage tents as may be necessary.

9. The surgeon general will provide the necessary medical supplies.

10. The colonel of ordnance will furnish such ordnance stores, including traveling forges, as may be necessary.

11. The first cavalry and the two companies second dragoons in Kansas will be supplied with horses and equipments for the full organization.

12. Requisitions for transportation will be made as early as possible, to enable the quartermaster general to comply therewith in season.

By command of Brevet Lieutenant General Scott.

L. THOMAS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Quartermaster General.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire also to have read extracts from communications from the Quartermaster General's department to the War Department.

They were read, as follows:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, February 17, 1858.

SIR: It is time that all the arrangements of the Quartermaster's department were being made for the operations in Utah already ordered; but the appropriations, as you are aware, are entirely exhausted, and nothing can be done either in the procurement of supplies, of the means of transportation, or of cavalry and artillery horses, unless an appropriation be speedily made by Congress, or the Secretary of War exercise the authority vested in him by the sixth section of an act of Congress entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," approved the 1st of May, 1820, which authorized contracts to be made without appropriations for their fulfillment, for the subsistence and clothing of the Army, and for the Quartermaster's department.

Hoping that the necessary appropriations would be made, I have delayed asking your attention to the act above referred to from day to day, and week to week, until it would perhaps be jeopardizing the best interests of the service to delay longer.

TH. S. JESUP,
Quartermaster General.

HON. JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War, Washington.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, March 5, 1858.

SIR: * * * * * The estimates now on my table from the departments and posts throughout our territory, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Kennebec and Puget's Sound to Florida Point and Arizona, including the drafts before mentioned, exceed a million and a half of dollars.

If appropriations cannot be obtained in a very few days, I most respectfully, but urgently, recommend that the power vested in the Secretary of War, by the act of Congress of the 1st of May, 1820, which authorizes contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army, and for the Quartermaster's department, without appropriations, be exercised. Every hour's delay will add to the expenditure.

TH. S. JESUP,
Quartermaster General.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will now read a brief extract of the law for the establishment of the Departments:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting, also, contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army or Navy, and contracts by the Quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is that the whole of the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is the whole of the law bearing on that question; and the committee will perceive from it that it became absolutely and indispensably necessary, in order to carry on the operations of the Army against Utah, that the power given to the Secretary of War, by this sixth section, should be exercised. There was no money whatever, subject to draft for these purposes; and, as the Quartermaster General says, unless this power, delegated by the law to the Secretary of War, was exercised, the enterprise would necessarily fail. Thus, you perceive that those officers of the Government have faithfully conformed to the law and discharged their duty, or, at all events, that no censure is to be applied to them for their action. Having thus vindicated them, and corrected my own statement, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. RITCHIE. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS], the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER], or some other member of the Committee of Ways and Means. I find in the bill, in the item appropriating $5,400,000, provision made for clearing roads and removing obstructions from roads, rivers, and harbors, as may be required for the operations of the Army. I desire to know whether it is made clear what rivers and harbors this refers to, and what amount of this appropriation is intended to be applied for that purpose?

Mr. PHELPS. In reply to the inquiry submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I have this to say: it is not designed by this appropriation to make any permanent improvement of any river or of any harbor. Several years since, in consequence of the extensive acquisitions of territory by this Government, and in consequence of its occupation by troops necessary to keep the Indians in subjection, it was found necessary to employ in the Quartermaster's department, and for the Government to become owner of, some small vessels; and it was found necessary to deepen some streams so as to enable the steamers to pass up and down in carrying supplies to the posts. These are not designed as any permanent works of improvement, but as mere contingencies incident to the transport of supplies. So far as military roads are concerned, it is oftentimes found necessary, when the Army is marching through a mountainous region beyond the verge of civilization, to employ a portion of the Army in cutting down the roads and throwing temporary bridges across the streams. And if the soldiers of the United States are employed in labor of that sort for more than ten days at a time they become entitled, under the laws of the United States, to extra compensation therefor.

Mr. RITCHIE. I understand that; and my question was simply to ascertain whether estimates were submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means for this purpose; whether any specific amounts were named and set apart?

Mr. PHELPS. None, sir. It was to provide for a mere contingency that may arise or may not arise. This is not an appropriation merely to cover expenditures already incurred, but also to cover expenditures that may be incurred during the rest of the fiscal year.

Mr. RITCHIE. I find this difficulty here, that the discretion of the Department is not restrained, either as to the rivers and harbors to which this appropriation may be applied, or as to the amount to be applied to them. The matter is left entirely to the discretion of the Department.

Mr. PHELPS. I would remark to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the language used in this appropriation is the same as has been used for the last six or eight years in the regular appropriation bills for the support and maintenance of the Army, under the head of "transportation of the Army." And yet there has not been submitted at any time, to my knowledge, any estimate for the improvement of a single river or harbor, or the construction of a military road, to be paid out of such appropriation for the transportation of the Army. It is a contingency that may arise or that may not arise. If the contingency does not arise, no money will be expended; if it does, only such amount as will be necessary will be expended. If, for instance, one of the boats owned by the Government of the United States should be sent up the Kansas river—which is sometimes navigable—and if the boat should run aground, would it not be an act of wisdom to employ men to deepen that point, so that the boat should be extricated and got into a deeper channel, and the expenses thereby taken out of the appropriation for the transport of the Army? That is a case embraced in this item.

Mr. RITCHIE. I merely desired to refer to the subject for the purpose of obtaining information in reference to it. It seemed to me that to embrace this particular item, in this general form, in so large an appropriation, is placing too large a discretion in the officers of the Government. They may carry these improvements to a greater extent than the House or Congress intended. That was all.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other gentleman desires to address the committee, the Chair will receive a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If no other gentleman desires to occupy the floor, I will occupy the attention of the committee for a few minutes. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS], on Friday last, in his remarks upon this bill, referred to the proceedings of a former Congress.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wish to make an inquiry. I wish to know if the gentleman from Tennessee has not already addressed the House upon the subject of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that, after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] had completed his remarks, no gentleman claimed the floor. The Chair waited for a sufficient time, and announced that he would receive a motion that the committee rise. No other gentleman still claiming the floor, the Chair awarded the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio, on that occasion, referred to the Congressional Globe of the last session, and to the discussion which took place between myself and the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman from Tennessee has already occupied his thirty minutes in debate. I was opposed to the order of the House of yesterday; but that order says: "And no member shall occupy more than thirty minutes in said debate." Now, unless the gentleman from Tennessee is not a member of this House, he has no right to speak under that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the House was designed to be prospective in its operation only. The provision is, that no member shall occupy more than thirty minutes in debate after the passage of that resolution. The gentleman from Tennessee occupied more than thirty minutes before the passage of the resolution, but not since its passage.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well; I think the construction of the Chair is correct. I withdraw my question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the third section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion, in the opinion of the Chair, is not in order in the present stage of proceedings.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move, then, to strike out $30,000 from the first clause for the contingent expenses of the House, in the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee indulge me a moment? I appeal to this House to allow whatever members may wish to say in anyway, in opposition to this bill, until the time fixed for the termination of this debate. It has been said that there are contracts covered up in this bill, and that there are provisions in it which are indefensible. Now, I trust that any gentleman who has anything which he desires to say, in regard to the provisions of this bill, will be heard until the time fixed for the termination of this debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe the rule of the House is, that no member of the House shall speak more than once upon any question until every member desiring to speak shall have spoken. Now, sir, before I commenced, I was willing to yield to any gentleman who desired to speak; but no gentleman claimed the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Tennessee, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] has withdrawn his point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] on Friday last, in which he referred to the increased pay for the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which is subscribed for and taken by the Senate and House of Representatives. He said:

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that provision, allowing one cent for every five pages beyond fifteen hundred for a short and three thousand for a long session, went back and proposed this addition for Congressional Globes and Appendices delivered and paid, before it was passed into law?"

"Mr. NICHOLS. I do not mean to be understood as saying any such thing."

To that a note is appended at the foot of the column in these words:

"Erroneous. In fact, the effect of the amendment indorsed by the gentleman from Tennessee was retrospective; it carried the increased pay back to the commencement of the Congress. Being retrospective, no difference in time affects the principle."

Now, sir, that was a correction appended after the speech was made in committee, and according to my understanding of this question, the correction itself is erroneous. In the first place, he says: "In fact, the amendment was indorsed by the gentleman from Tennessee himself." I did not indorse it, but I merely, after it had become a law, and when a proposition came from the Senate to appropriate the money to meet the liability created by that law, explained to the House what it was.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to know what this past legislation has to do with the bill before the House?

Mr. NICHOLS. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule adopted yesterday requires the debate to be confined to the bill. There is, however, an item in the bill making an appropriation for the reporters of the Globe; and the Chair supposes the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee are pertinent to the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. That has nothing to do with the past legislation of Congress.

Mr. NICHOLS. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Did the Chair decide that I was out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not, as he was not giving his attention particularly to the gentleman's remarks at the time the point of order was made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. When the gentleman from Ohio addressed the committee on Friday last, he intimated that the appropriation for the Congressional Globe, to which he referred, was retrospective in its operation. I think it did not extend back of the session of Congress that made it a law.

Mr. SEWARD. I was opposed to the adoption of this order of the House, but I insist that it shall be enforced. I say that these preëxisting laws have nothing to do with this bill. The gentleman is speaking upon a point not in issue.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I say it did not go back beyond the session of Congress at which it was made. And I say further, that there has never been one cent paid under that provision for any copy of that work that had been bound and delivered, or had been printed before that law was passed.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred to a speech of mine in the Congressional Globe of the last session. The question between the gentleman from Georgia, now Secretary of the Treasury, and myself was as to the usual extra compensation, and the prohibition of that compensation by the joint resolutions of July 20, 1854. When that gentleman came to defend the Committee of Ways and Means in making the certificate or indorsement of the Committee of Accounts of this House conclusive upon the controlling officers of the Treasury, he referred to the case of Mr. Forney, who had been Clerk of the House. He referred also to the resolution increasing the regular annual compensation of Mr. Lamborne, and of Mr. Galt. In the note to my speech you will find that I stated that in regard to the cases of Forney, Galt, and Lamborne, to which the gentleman had referred, not one of them came under the resolutions of July 20, 1854, and were therefore not cases in point in the debate on that bill about extra compensation.

Mr. Chairman, as this question of extra compensation is in this bill, I will state what has been the legislation on the subject for the last few years. When the salary of the Clerk of this House was $3,000, and the salary of his chief clerk was $2,000, and the salary of the other assistants $1,500, it was the practice, at the close of every session, to pass what was called an extra compensation resolution, giving twenty per cent. to the officers and other employes of the House, and the laborers and others on the public grounds, where the amount would equal $200 on their annual salary; but where it would not amount to that, then $200 was voted to each, without regard to the salary. To correct that practice Congress, in 1854, passed this joint resolution, which was approved by the President on the 20th of July in that year:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the officers, clerks, messengers, and other employes in the legislative department of the Government, shall be paid an increased compensation of twenty per cent. upon the compensation now received by them respectively; and the messengers of the House of Representatives shall not receive less than is allowed to messengers of the Senate of the same class; such increased compensation to commence from the 1st day of July, 1853; and that a sum sufficient to pay the same to the 30th of June, 1855, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no person whose compensation was increased by the act approved April 21, 1854, shall be benefited by this joint resolution: And provided further, That the usual extra compensation shall not hereafter be allowed to any person receiving the benefits of this joint resolution."

This resolution permanently increased the regular annual compensation of the officers and other employes of this House to the extent of twenty per cent.; and the last proviso, it will be noticed, is that the usual extra compensation should not be allowed to any person receiving the benefits of this resolution. And, sir, at that session, those who received the twenty per cent. addition did not receive the usual extra compensation. The pages, and laborers, and others, twenty per cent. on whose salary would not amount to the $200 which they were in the habit of getting as usual extra compensation, and who did not avail themselves of the benefit of the resolution, had a resolution passed for them, giving them the usual extra compensation. And then, in order to give it to them, a joint resolution was passed on the 5th of August, 1854, "that the sum appropriated by the House of Representatives, on this day, for the payment of its pages and employes, be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." This was at the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress. At the second session of that Congress the officers and employes did not receive the usual extra compensation. No resolution was passed for them, but one was passed giving extra compensation to the pages, laborers, and those who did not receive the benefit of the resolution of July 20, 1854. That resolution of July 20th was being executed. It was observed at that and the succeeding session; but in the last Congress it was broken down and overriden by a resolution from the Clerk's office, I suppose, to give the usual extra compensation. This resolution was passed 15th August, 1856, and vouchers were presented under it to the accounting officers of the Treasury. Credit, in their accounts, was refused to those claims; and hence they came to Congress at the last session. A bill was brought here from the Committee of Ways and Means, to take the control over the contingent fund of the two Houses from the accounting officers of the Treasury, and to make what was done here absolute and conclusive upon them. A discussion took place here on the subject. It passed the House, but the Senate refused to agree to it. Then, in order to maintain what the House had done, and, if you please, to give notice to the Clerk and to all the beneficiaries of that joint resolution, Congress, at its last session, passed this law in the deficiency bill, approved March 3, 1857:

"And be it further enacted, That the extra compensation given by each of the two Houses of Congress in the year 1856 to its officers and employes shall be paid by its disbursing officer out of the contingent fund, and his accounts therefor shall be allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to repeal the joint resolution of the 20th of July, 1854, to fix the compensation of the employes in the legislative department of the Government and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as received the benefits thereof, which said resolution is declared hereby to be in full force and effect, so far as herein provided for."

There was the first resolution passed in violation of the joint resolution of 1854, prohibiting the usual extra compensation. They had refused to allow the accounts of the Treasury; and Congress, as was then said, in justification, and to indemnify the officer here who had made disbursements under the law, passed this law to give their vouchers validity at the Treasury Department. But it reenacted, in fact, and declared that it should not affect, the joint resolution of 1854 upon the same subject.

But, sir, just at the very time that this appropriation was made here and action had upon that extra compensation resolution, another resolution, in violation both of the joint resolution and of this law, was passed through the last House. I think it was introduced by Mr. Dunn, on the 2d of March last—I do not recollect the exact time; but it was passed, giving the usual extra compensation, in direct violation of the joint resolution of 1854, and the act of the last session, legalizing the resolution of the previous session of Congress. Well, sir, that resolution was passed in March, 1857, and I believe that up to the 25th of January, 1858, no receipts and no vouchers had been presented at the Treasury by the Clerk in the settlement of his accounts under that resolution. So said the officers of the Department to me. I have here a letter from the Auditor to the Secretary of the Treasury, sent to me by the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a note which I addressed him.

Then, if there has been no money paid under that joint resolution, when they have had two laws to warn them against the passage of it, and those who are to be its beneficiaries knew that those two laws were in force, I ask now with what show of plausibility or justice can they come here and present again a proposition to overrule those laws of 1854 and 1857, and again to recognize the resolution of the House of 1857?

Now, Mr. Chairman, a good deal is said about the contingencies of this House. I know that it is impossible for your laws, or for anything else, or for anybody to specify what contingencies there may be. There may be necessary expenditures here that it is impossible to foresee, and which properly come under the head of contingencies. But one thing I will say, that when Congress appropriates a certain sum of money to the contingent fund of this House, the House is bound, by all the rules of justice and of honesty, in my opinion, to apply that appropriation to the legitimate contingencies of the House. Then, sir, I would ask you if they would be authorized to use that contingent appropriation for purposes which are not authorized by the Constitution of the country? Is it to be supposed, because the money is given to the House as a contingent fund, that they may dispose of it in any way whatever in accordance with their will and caprice. I hold that what the House did ten years ago, is not a contingency of this House; and, if it exists yet, it is a claim in the hands of those who have it, and is not a contingency of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress; and we have no right, in my opinion—no legal right—to go back and to pay out of the contingent fund of this House extra or increased pay to officers of former Houses under what may be called contingencies. It is not fairly and legitimately a contingency; and when we use the contingent fund, it must be for the legitimate contingencies of the House. Now, the resolution of 1854 prohibits the usual extra compensation, and the law of 1857 again prohibits it by continuing in force and effect the resolution of 1854. The third section of this bill does not even say that the resolution of 1854 shall be continued in force; and, if that section shall pass, it will be construed hereafter as a repeal of both the joint resolution of 1854, and the law of 1857.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I see by this bill that almost eight million dollars are to be appropriated to supply a deficiency in the expenses of the Army. The regular appropriation for the Army last year was almost fifteen millions. Here is an amount as large as half the regular appropriation proposed to be made in a deficiency bill.

I can see that there might be occasions in the administration of the Government, where a deficiency would arise legitimately in any of its departments, but I am unable to see how, under a fair and proper administration of the Government, half of the amount required for the expenses of the Government in its regular, ordinary appropriations, can be asked in addition in the way of a deficiency.

We were told by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] the other day, that part of this amount is for regular current expenses to accrue hereafter. I am opposed to appropriating in a deficiency bill for any expenses to accrue in the future. I only rise now to call the attention of the House to the abuse which has grown up in the expenditures of the Government by our executive officers in exceeding the amount of the appropriation made by Congress.

First Congress is asked to appropriate a small amount for a doubtful object, in order that they may then come in with a deficiency bill, and compel just the amount of expenditure which your officers want to make. In this case we find a deficiency of nearly eight million dollars, on a regular appropriation of $15,000,000. When the expenses of our Army have run up since 1820 from $336 56 per man to nearly fourteen hundred dollars per man this year, it becomes the Representatives of the people, in granting money for the expenses of the Army, to scan well for what purpose the money is appropriated. When the expenses of this Government have run up from $46,000,000 in 1852, to $70,000,000 in 1857, it becomes the duty of the guardians of the Treasury to inquire why this enormous increase of the expenditures of the Government. Of all modes of making these appropriations, that of a deficiency is the most objectionable, and there should be some overruling necessity to make a deficiency bill necessary at all. Congress first passes upon the necessities of one Department of the Government, and says we will give so much money for it. Then, let our executive officers keep within that amount; and if the public service suffer, it is the fault of Congress, not of the executive officers.

In the Post Office Department, I can see well how deficiencies might occur legitimately, without any blame on the part of executive officers, and with an earnest attempt to keep within the appropriations. Congress makes the appropriation on the uncertainty of how much revenue is to be derived by the Department itself, and, therefore, it is impossible to estimate exactly; for it is a Department receiving money as well as paying it out. Their contracts for service are all fixed in amount, and if the income is not sufficient to meet the specific contracts, then Congress has to make appropriations to supply the deficiencies. But in any other Department of the Government, in which no moneys are received, and where the Department estimates for its expenses, I hold that the Department is bound to keep within the regular appropriations by Congress. Otherwise, we have no control over the expenses of the Government. For after the debts are contracted by the executive officers, we are appealed to in behalf of the citizen who is to lose his property, that the Government has taken it; and that, unless Congress appropriates in a deficiency bill, the citizen will lose his pay. It may be said Congress need not appropriate the deficiency. That is true; it can be withheld; but who is the sufferer? Not the officer of the Government; not the Government—for they have taken the property or the labor of the private citizen, and refused to pay him. An appeal is then made to us, in the name of humanity and of justice, to compel the payment of money for the support of the Departments of the Government for which, in the first instance, we refuse to appropriate. My only object was to call the attention of the committee to the abuse, not to discuss the bill. We have here a deficiency asked for the support of the Army, half as large as the regular appropriation for the fiscal year. I know of no way of correcting such abuses but by defeating the bill that supplies such deficiency.

Mr. NICHOLS. When this question was under discussion the other day between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] and myself, there was another very distinct branch of the subject discussed. It was in relation to certain claims which were specifically brought to the attention of the House in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. I made what I claimed to be an argument in favor of the power of the House and of the Committee of Accounts to make the allowances particularly instanced by the gentleman from Tennessee, and by the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not find that my friend from Tennessee makes any question with me now about these particular claims.

I have only one word to say in regard to this appropriation for the Globe. I appended a note to my remarks on Friday, precisely as the gentleman from Tennessee appended a note to some remarks after a discussion between himself and the present Secretary of the Treasury, in the last Congress, and I thought there was nothing unfair in it. Was the appropriation retrospective, or was it prospective? That is the point. My own impression was, at the time of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, that it was prospective. But, sir, the provision for the increased pay was put into an appropriation bill at the close of the session of Congress, and it carried the pay back to the commencement of that session. It was, therefore, retrospective in its influence.

Mr. Chairman, in regard to the other branch of this question, the law began at the period which I stated in my former remarks, in the Twenty-Ninth Congress, I think. It was the absolute custom of each House to vote this increased compensation to its employes, and put the amount in the appropriation bill, as a matter of course. In the appropriation bill of 1845, a proviso was inserted that no such extra should thereafter be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. Well, sir, I hold that the force of that proviso expired with the appropriation made in that bill. I have cited the authority of the Treasury Department, and of distinguished gentlemen who have occupied positions on this floor, in support of my position. After that, this twenty per cent. extra was voted and paid by both branches of Congress. In 1854, we adopted a joint resolution to this effect, that the salaries of certain of the employes should be increased twenty per cent., with the further proviso that the usual extra compensation should cease to those employes who would derive benefit under it. At the subsequent session to the passage of this resolution, provision was made for certain parties outside of that joint resolution. There is no disagreement between the gentleman and myself on that point. At the first session of the next Congress, a general resolution for extra pay was again voted, and appropriations were made for it in the appropriation bill. At the last session of Congress, certain extras were voted in both branches of Congress; and we find this state of facts prevailing, that where certain claims on this side have been suspended, and have been brought to the attention of Congress, no notice of a suspension of the like claims in the Senate has been received.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the gentleman intend to be understood that the extra compensations voted by the Senate have been paid, and the accounts settled at the Treasury?

Mr. NICHOLS. No, sir; I have not stated that, and I do not state it now. I say, however, that they were paid in the Senate, and that no notice of their disallowance has been received there.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Perhaps the disbursing officer in the Senate has not sent his vouchers to the Treasury, and perhaps no gentleman has called for any information on the subject. I inquired whether payment was made of this extra compensation to those who were entitled to receive it under the joint resolution, and I learned that, up to the 25th of February, there have been none of them settled.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman alludes to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had received no notice of the payment of any of this general extra compensation on the Senate side, and therefore he draws the inference that none of them have been paid. He says that perhaps none of them have been presented in this House. Now, perhaps, they have all been paid. The fact of non-presentation at the Treasury on one side, it appears, is no evidence of non-payment; then it ought to be none on the other; and one argument is just as good as the other.

Mr. Chairman, I take it there is but one practical point here, and that is this: Has this House the power to pay these extras to its employes out of its contingent fund? What does the Secretary of the Treasury say? Does he find his justification for suspending these particular claims in the joint resolution of 1854? If he does, I concede that I do not understand his argument. No, sir, he puts it upon the direct provisions and limitations contained in the appropriation act of 1845.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me. The vouchers which the Secretary of the Treasury sent here, and which are to be found on pages 82 and 83 of his annual report upon the finances, do not purport to be paid under the usual extra compensation resolution, but under separate and distinct resolutions, giving an increased compensation for ten years back, and for the future until otherwise ordered. The Secretary, therefore, puts his suspension of these claims upon the ground that that sort of increase is prohibited by the act of 1845, and not by the joint resolution of 1854.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman now speaks of allowances which have been made by the House and by the Committee of Accounts. Now, sir, take the allowances in the list made by the Committee of Accounts. I showed the other day that claims precisely similar in their character, under precisely the same circumstances, and for precisely the same services, have been allowed by Committees of Accounts since the Twenty-Ninth Congress. Where are they paid? From what fund are they drawn? From the contingent fund of the House. I showed that these claims had been allowed and passed at the Treasury Department for a series of years—allowed from that fund, and from no other fund. They have not been suspended under the act of 1845. Now, where is the difference in principle between allowances to be paid out of the contingent fund for extra services, and other allowances made under resolutions of the House? I cannot distinguish the difference. If these things be in violation of law, if there be no power and no authority to pay them, I say the House ought not to vote them.

But I look upon them rather as determined by the past action of the Treasury Department. In paying the amounts voted by the House by resolutions, when rights have accrued under them, we do no more than simple justice.

But the gentleman says that some of these claims have not been paid. I do not know how that is, but I know that, as a former member of the Committee of Accounts, I have been approached by gentlemen who said that they had advanced money for needy persons, who had made assignments of their claims and gone off home.

Now, where interests of this kind have accrued, I am for paying these bills and making provision for preventing the abuse hereafter. It is wrong, sir, I know, to justify one bad precedent by another, if we have no right to make these appropriations; but were I so disposed, I could show that, in a committee in the Thirty-Third Congress, upon which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] himself served, there was a clerk employed by no other power than a mere resolution of this House, who at the same time drew his pay at the Treasury Department, as clerk in that Department, while there was at the same time a law in force prohibiting any man from filling two offices and drawing the pay of two offices. Now, upon what principle was this double compensation paid? He was paid as clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means, the compensation which the House adjudged to be reasonable, by a simple resolution of the House, and with no other authority. It can be justified in no other way than upon the principle that the House has the control of its contingent fund. It was paid upon the mere resolution of the House, and by no other authority, and rests upon no other foundation. This is all I propose to say upon the subject.

Mr. DOWDELL. I deem it proper to say, in the outset, that I consider deficiency bills an evil, but a necessary evil. It is impossible to provide against their necessity. It is impossible to make estimates in advance that shall cover every contingency that may arise. The contingency which this deficiency bill covers, for the transportation of troops to Utah, could not have been foreseen; and hence the large amount included in this bill. I am willing to cooperate in any plan for correcting this evil; but I do not believe it can be entirely avoided.

I rise, however, more particularly to speak of the latter section of this bill. It has been the uniform practice of the House, for the last twelve years, to pass resolutions which have received a construction at the Treasury Department, to pay extra compensation to the employes of the House. The difficulty now arises from the fact that the present Secretary of the Treasury has gone back to the commencement, to the law of 1845, and has reversed the decisions of his predecessors. But seeing the injustice which has been done in consequence of these conflicting decisions, he advises payment to be made.

Now, sir, I have looked into these resolutions for extra compensation, resolutions from the first session of the Twenty-Ninth Congress to the present time. The resolutions are similar in their phraseology, and this usual extra compensation was voted up to 1854. In that year a joint resolution was passed confining it to officers who did not receive annual salaries, and twenty per cent. was added to the pay of the salaried officers. Now, I desire to read one clause from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the foundation of the remarks which I propose to make. He says:

"In the settlement of the accounts of the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the accounting officers of the Treasury, a question arose as to the power of the two Houses of Congress over their respective contingent funds. Under resolutions passed by the House of Representatives, the Clerk had paid certain sums to different employes of the House for extra services rendered by them, and the question was presented to me whether he could be allowed credit for such payments, in view of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1845, which was evidently intended to prevent the application of the contingent fund of the two Houses to such purposes. My opinion was, that the act of March 3, 1845, was still in force in this respect, and I accordingly held that the credits could not be allowed. The reasons for that opinion are so fully stated in my letter of June 30, 1857, to the First Auditor of the Treasury—as a copy of which accompanies this report, marked J1—that it is unnecessary again to discuss the question. In conformity to the suggestions of that letter, and for the reasons therein given, I recommend the passage of a law for the relief of the parties who have acted under the different construction placed upon the law by this Department."

In the letter referred to, in this extract from the report, after giving the reasons for his decision, the Secretary further says:

"The greatest reluctance I have felt in coming to this conclusion, arises from the apprehension that injustice may be done to the persons whose claims have thus been recognized, and the officers of the Senate and House, who have acted in good faith in complying with the directions of the respective Houses.

"In paying these accounts, they have only done what they were required to do, and what long established usage justified them in doing. Under such circumstances they should be protected from any loss or injury, and I have no doubt Congress will do it."

If the decision of the present Secretary of the Treasury be not law, I hope that it will be made the law, and that officers shall have a fixed salary, not to be increased or diminished during their term of service.

I am as much opposed to granting extra compensation as any gentleman on this floor. If this was an original proposition to give extra, I should not vote for it. But I do not look upon it in that light at all. The objections set forth to the evils of the practice do not apply to the case before us. It is whether we will in good faith perform obligations incurred by a previous Congress; whether we will permit our officers and other parties who have acted under resolutions of the House, and the uniform decisions of the Treasury Department for years, to be, by a sudden change of construction, damaged.

Taking this view of the subject—and I believe it to be a correct one—I do not see how we can justly refuse to discharge these obligations, however much we may be opposed to the former practice of the two Houses. Besides, by passing the bill in this shape, we shall be vindicating the decision of the Secretary—acknowledging the necessity of joint action of the two Houses in order to appropriate its own contingent fund to such purposes.

It is a question of the power of the House over its contingent fund. Up to the decision of the Secretary recently made, each House has paid its own officers this usual extra compensation. Constructions are now conflicting, and under that conflict of construction, I hope this House will not suffer these parties to be injured. The present Secretary has differently construed the act from all of his predecessors.

In the act of 1845 there is the following provision:

"Provided, That no part of the sums appropriated for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives; nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them; nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, unless such clerk, messenger, or other attendant be so employed by a resolution or order of one of the said Houses."

The second session of the same Congress passed a similar clause in an appropriation bill.

The Secretary has based his decision upon the ground that this clause was general in its character, and designed to be permanent; that it did not expire with the fiscal year; that, being in force since 1845, the practice of his Department was in violation of it. I do not intend to complain at his decision. I trust that it may stand as the law; but, at the same time, I hope that his recommendations may be heeded by the House, and those who have been induced to rely upon the decision of his predecessors may be saved harmless. Another reason for this may be found in the fact that the same Congress which passed the clause furnishing the basis of the decision of the Secretary, at its next session passed a similar clause, thus giving the highest evidence that it did not consider the law general and permanent; but, in accordance with the construction subsequently given by the officers of the Treasury, to expire with the fiscal year.

There exists now, Mr. Chairman, a conflict of construction upon this law. Under this difference of construction, the employés, legitimately expecting that portion of their wages, have incurred liabilities, contracted debts in good faith, confidently relying upon the Government which had heretofore uniformly paid these extra allowances.

Some third parties, bona fide holders, into whose hands some of these claims have passed, are also liable to be injured by the change of construction. It may be argued that the practice has no law for it, but it has been the usage for years. The Comptroller of the Treasury, in a letter addressed to the Secretary, says, that its origin consists in the supposed absolute right of each House to dispose of its contingent fund according to its pleasure.

The former Secretary of the Treasury, under a similar resolution of the first session of the last Congress, when it was represented to him that the Clerk failed to make a requisition for the money to pay some of the employés, sent the amount affixed to each name, entitled under the resolution, with direction that it be paid, and that a requisition be made out for the sum.

When the last accounts were submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Doorkeeper gave his certificate that the persons named were entitled to the money. Most of those who claimed the money were pages and folders and laborers. Some of them lived in various parts of the country, and could not afford to remain here long after the adjournment. The resolution was in conformity with the practice of the Government for a dozen years. There was a decision of the Comptroller and Secretary of the Treasury in its favor. They deposited these certificates, and money was advanced upon them. Then they went to their homes. Now there is a different construction; and is it not right that we should make the appropriation to save bona fide owners of these claims? Many good men of this city advanced the money that these pages and laborers might not be detained; and the payment of it is now arrested suddenly by a new construction of the law; but, in order to prevent injury, the Secretary of the Treasury recommends that these claims shall be paid.

Here is a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, which I ask may be read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
April 11, 1857.

SIR: The House of Representatives of Congress, on the 24 of March last, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives a like amount of additional compensation to the same officers, clerks, messengers, and other employés of the House, and others, as was directed to be paid at the first session of the present Congress by the resolution of the House of August 15, 1856."

There was a class of persons within the true intent and meaning of this resolution that are not embraced in the prohibitory clause of the joint resolution of the 20th of July, 1854, who ought to be paid, if there is an appropriation that can be legitimately issued for that purpose. Many of the persons composing it are minors, some of them having widowed mothers, who, to some extent, depend upon the service of their sons for support, and none of them, so far as I have any knowledge upon the subject, are in easy circumstances. Many inquiries have been made by, or on the part of those concerned, respecting the payment of the class of employés referred to; and it has been stated that some of the persons have been obliged to assign their claims at a discount to raise money. Seventeen of the contingent appropriations for the House of Representatives are for specific objects, that cannot, as I conceive, be used for any other than the designated purposes, except under the law regulating transfers.

The eighteenth contingent appropriation is as follows: "For miscellaneous items, $50,000." I submit for your consideration two questions.

First, can any part of that appropriation be used to pay the employés under the resolution of 2d March, copied above, who are not within the prohibitory clause of the joint resolution of July 20, 1856?

Second, if so, can the payment be made before the 1st of July next?

The Clerk has made no requisition for this class of employés, nor did he under the resolution of the House of Representatives of August 15, 1856. Under that resolution he drew for himself and for the officers within his class; and this year he has drawn a requisition for the same class under the second section of the deficiency act, and received the money.

To remove the complaint that existed last year by the folders, pages, and others of that class, the Secretary of the Treasury having, through the correspondence of this office, obtained a list of the names of the persons entitled to pay, and the amount due to each, he drew his warrant upon the Treasury, which being perfected according to law, the money was drawn from the Treasury, a draft was sent to the Clerk, with a list of the names of the persons to be paid, and the amount due to each noted.

If relief can be legally granted in this mode, or in some other that may appear to you better adapted to the occasion, much gratification would be given to those concerned, and much anxious solicitude terminated.

Most sincerely yours,

ELISHA WHITTLESEY.

Hon. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

The other class of cases, which had been excluded by the joint resolution of July, 1854, and which had, at the previous session of Congress, been provided for by a joint resolution, did not come within the decision of the Department, so as to receive the extra. Therefore, at the last session, a joint resolution was passed by both Houses, and signed by their respective officers, allowing them likewise the usual extra; but, in the expiring moments of the session, it was overlooked, or not signed by the President. It did not become a law; yet, under the resolution of the House, the Clerk has advanced to some of this class. What amount I do not know, but I understand a considerable sum has been actually paid. I am not in favor of making distinctions. If a part of them have been paid, I see no reason why the balance should not likewise be paid. The better course, Mr. Chairman, would be, to pay off these debts, as the Secretary of the Treasury recommends; thus, by a congressional construction, admit the necessity of the joint action of both Houses to dispose of the contingent fund of either, and so get rid of the practice of giving extra compensation altogether.

Let the decision of the Secretary henceforth stand as the law—that neither House shall touch its contingent fund except for ordinary purposes, unless by concurrence of both; and I believe we shall have no further trouble on the subject. As I remarked in the beginning, I am opposed to granting extra compensation; but I think that good faith requires us to discharge these obligations incurred by the previous Congress; and I shall therefore vote for this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had not expected to engage in this discussion. I have reflected, however, upon the position I will occupy, under my judgment of the case, by the vote I shall be compelled to give upon this bill, in its present shape, and have determined to make a few remarks. As this bill now stands before the committee, I shall be compelled to vote against it, and I desire to give some of the reasons which will induce me to give that vote.

I know, Mr. Chairman, it is exceedingly difficult, under any circumstances, to prepare an appropriation bill, with the multiplicity of items which they must ordinarily embrace, that meets the approbation of all the members of a legislative body. Why, sir, we know that the leaving out of one class of items will probably offend the judgments of some of the members of the body, while, perhaps, if you were to insert them in the bill, you would drive from its support quite as many members.

In this particular crisis in our military operations, I feel very great hesitation, very strong reluctance in voting against a bill which proposes to appropriate money for the support of the Army, and especially when that appropriation comes recommended to us by the various proper officers and Departments of the Government, and especially for deficiencies which have occurred, or which it is known will occur, during the current fiscal year. But, Mr. Chairman, although I feel every desire to vote for appropriations such as are intended fairly for the support of the Army, and to enable it to act efficiently in carrying out the purposes of the Government, yet if there are items in the bill which I regard as I do some of the items in this bill, I shall be compelled to oppose the passage of the bill.

In the first place, there are several items here—and the third section is one of them—that ought not to be in this bill under any circumstances. Admit, if you please, the existence of the resolutions, as gentlemen contend, by which these items are attempted to be sustained; and admit, if you please, that the claims arising under them have passed into the hands of bona fide holders, as my colleague [Mr. DOWDELL] has argued, they are, at best, nothing but private claims, and should be treated as other private claims. One of the rules of this House—I do not remember the number of it, but it is one that is practiced on very extensively, and should be universally—provides that no appropriation not authorized by law shall be put in a general appropriation bill; and such is the practice in regard to private claims. The rules of this House forbid the insertion in an appropriation bill, by the Committee of Ways and Means, and also by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, of items such as are embraced in the third section of this bill. This committee cannot insert an item in this bill that is not authorized by an existing law. I do not refer to this as a cause of censure of the Committee of Ways and Means, for I know the difficulty experienced by that committee. I know the great number of propositions that are presented to them, and the pressure there is for all such appropriations of money to be embodied in their bills; and, therefore, nothing that I say is intended as a matter of complaint against them for doing that which I regard, and which I have no doubt you, Mr. Chairman, regard, as violative of the rule of the House to which I have referred.

Now, sir, I ask what existing law there is to justify this appropriation for the reporters? I will take that first. What existing law is there for it? I would be glad if some gentleman would turn to the law authorizing the appropriation to enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the House, for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress, the compensation of $800 each? There is no rule of the House which justifies it. I am not now speaking of the merits of the proposition. I will do that directly.

There is another objection to this item. It is presented in a deficiency bill. What do you understand by a deficiency? A deficiency is where an appropriation has been made, and where that appropriation is not sufficient to meet the object. The appropriation being absorbed or exhausted before the fiscal year terminates, then Congress is called upon to appropriate additional money as a deficiency to carry out that for which the previous appropriation was not sufficient. Now, is this a deficiency? Certainly it is not. It is intended to be given to the reporters of the House of Representatives for the work they are now doing; and that, if we were even bound to pay it by law, would properly belong to one of the regular bills, and not this one. It is not entitled to be in this bill; because there is no law to justify it; because it is not a deficiency.

Gentlemen tell us that the House passed resolutions for extra compensation to clerks. That is all true. But the resolutions are not law—however equitable may be their claims under those resolutions, they certainly are not founded upon a law of the land, such as the rules of the House contemplate, to justify the placing such items in the general appropriation bills. They are resolutions adopted by the House for the payment of money out of the contingent fund. The same argument applies to the item in regard to the clerks, as in the case of the reporters. There is no law to justify it, and however long the practice of the House may have been to carry out, in what gentlemen are pleased to call good faith, similar resolutions, yet they do not constitute the law of Congress, and not being a law, they do not justify their being put in the appropriation bills.

Again, Mr. Chairman, take up your Private Calendar, and look at it for a moment. You will find it spotted from the beginning to the end with cases of a like character with these—I mean private claims. Where is the Dickinson claim now; that has been resisted in this House from time to time, and from year to year, and thus far with success? It is not in an appropriation bill, but on the Private Calendar. Mr. Dickinson claims, under a usage of the Government, which he contends is of such long standing that it is equivalent to law, for services rendered by him as acting Secretary of State, in the absence of the Secretary. Why, sir, that claim could have been put into this appropriation bill with the same propriety and with the same fairness as these; and, if these are retained, no good reason exists to exclude that. In times past, when I was connected with the Committee of Ways and Means, efforts were made to have that item put in the appropriation bills; but it has always been excluded, either by the Committee of Ways and Means, or by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It was excluded on the ground that it was a private claim, as well as upon the ground that there was no law to justify its insertion in an appropriation bill. Why should we make Mr. Dickinson's go upon the Private Calendar, and allow the claims of other gentlemen—admitting that they are equitable—a place in the appropriation bills? There is no sufficient reason, in my judgment, for such difference. They are like private claims, unsupported by law, and should be placed on the Private Calendar.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] has argued to show that the Committee of Accounts had a right to dispose of the contingent fund of the House; and that reminds me of another proposition which I desire to make in reference to this bill. It is to strike out the fourteenth line, which classes a number of items as contingent expenses of the House of Representatives. Under that designation the Committee of Accounts would claim a license to use the money embraced in any one of those items for any other of them, or for any other object that committee might determine to be a contingency of the House. You have, for instance, an item of a few thousand dollars for newspapers, and you have items for laborers, furniture, &c. Every dollar embraced in them under the power claimed by that committee, may be appropriated to any other item which that committee may determine to be a contingency of the House whether specified or not. The gentleman from Ohio argues that the Committee of Accounts have a right to dispose of the contingent fund of the House. I do not propose to argue that with him now; yet I am well satisfied that he errs in saying that the Committee of Accounts can appropriate one dollar of the contingent fund outside of the proper and legal contingencies of the House of Representatives.

But admit that the Committee of Accounts could do so: what is the condition of most or several of these cases? It is extraordinary that the gentleman from Ohio, or any other gentleman, would argue that these accounts were in a condition to pass with credit in this city, or to be paid at the Treasury. If the Committee of Accounts have a right to control our contingent fund, they must pass upon accounts before the money is paid; that cannot have been the case here. I would like my colleague to tell me when the account of Mr. Barclay was audited by the Committee of Accounts? I would like him to tell me when the account of Mr. Buck was audited; or when the account of Mr. Walker, the reading clerk, was audited by the Committee of Accounts? The resolutions in their behalf were passed in the very last hours of the session, but a short time before the constitutional dissolution of Congress. There was no member of Congress after the 4th of March; no Committee of Accounts, and no mode by which those claims could be audited. But we are told these accounts are indorsed by Mr. Thurston, of Rhode Island—indorsed by him when he was not only not a member of the Committee of Accounts, but not even a member of the Congress. Mr. Thurston's indorsement of the accounts was made after the 4th of March. It could not, as I believe, have been made sooner. It was made after Congress had expired by the constitutional limitation, and he had no more right to indorse them than I had.

Mr. LETCHER. As my friend from Alabama seems to want information on that point, I would tell him that, as I understand, the accounts were prepared before the resolution passed the House, and as soon as it did pass, Mr. Thurston indorsed them, before Congress adjourned, just as a bill is engrossed in advance.

Mr. HOUSTON. That makes the matter worse than it was before, for it shows that there was trickery in the thing; and for that, if nothing else, Congress should reject it. If it was passed in legal form, and if it took the usual course for the indorsement of the Committee of Accounts, I could understand it. But when your officers, in advance, draw up resolutions and put them into the hands of members to have them offered, then prepare their accounts, have them ready and re-accepted, even before the passage of the resolution, it looks to me that there is something involved in such conduct which does not commend itself to the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman let me see whether I cannot place him in just as bad a condition? I desire to know whether, before last Congress expired, the gentleman did not execute a receipt, and make a full settlement with the Sergeant-at-Arms, just as I did?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is not the question, and has no bearing upon the one before us. That was my legal compensation; known to me and known to the Sergeant-at-Arms to be due me under a law which has been existing on your statute-book for years. Here there was no law at all. But, sir, I do not recollect whether I did so or not. If it was necessary, I did; but my opinion is that I settled with the Sergeant-at-Arms afterwards. But whether I did or not, does not reach this case, or apply to it at all. That was my compensation, allowed me under the laws of the United States, and the officer knew I was entitled to it.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to say that the chairman of the Committee of Accounts indorsed these accounts after the Congress had expired, and therefore that it was wrong. He was then informed that the accounts were indorsed during the session of Congress. The gentleman from Alabama complained that that too was wrong, worse than the other. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama when it would have been proper for the Committee of Accounts to have passed upon these accounts?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will answer the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure. It would, in my opinion, have been proper for the Committee of Accounts to have passed upon these accounts when they were in session, and the claims presented; and if the committee could not so act at the session when the resolutions were adopted by the House, the matter should have gone over to the next Congress, when the committee could properly examine them.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I understand these accounts were indorsed during the session of Congress; and, in my opinion, that was the legal and proper time.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, I desire to ask my friend from Tennessee a question. The gentleman understands the circumstances under which these resolutions were passed; that they were passed during the last hours of the session; now I ask if he believes the accounts under them could have been properly made out and audited by the Committee of Accounts before the adjournment of Congress?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I will tell the gentleman what I understand to have been the case. I understand that these officers of the House had their accounts in readiness before the passage of the resolutions, and that after the resolutions were passed, they presented them to the Committee of Accounts, and they were audited before the adjournment.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will look at the rules of the House and parliamentary law, he will find that committees of the House are not to straggle about the Capitol indorsing accounts wherever they find them; they are to meet in their regular committee room; meet in regular form; and, a quorum being present, they may proceed to business. They must, however, act by the regularly constituted authority.

Mr. LETCHER. Will my friend from Alabama allow me to ask who indorses these accounts? Are they indorsed by the committee, or by the chairman?

Mr. HOUSTON. I should be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Virginia, but my time has nearly expired. They are, or should be, indorsed by the chairman by direction of the committee, after the claims have been examined.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to correct the gentleman from Alabama in point of fact. I recollect very distinctly that about an hour before the last Congress broke up, I received notice from some person—I forget who—that the Committee of Accounts were in session. I repaired to the room in which they had met, and found the other members of the committee present. I had been previously officially engaged in the adjustment of some other business. We closed that session of the committee. These accounts were audited, and I returned into the Hall of the House about half an hour before the adjournment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The statement just made by the gentleman from Ohio discloses this fact, to which I desire to call the attention of the House: that the clerks of the House, instead of attending to the business of the House, were parading the Committee of Accounts, and getting their accounts audited under those resolutions.

Mr. NICHOLS. If the gentleman will allow me, he is mistaken in that statement. I did not receive any notice from one of the clerks of the House; but, I think, through one of the messengers.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman seems to be particularly sensitive upon this point.

Mr. NICHOLS. Not at all.

Mr. HOUSTON. It may have been after all by the Clerk through one of his messengers.

Mr. NICHOLS. Very likely; I do not know that it makes much difference whether it was or not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, sir, I desire to refer simply to another thing. My colleague argues that these claims, or many of them, have passed into the hands of bona fide holders, by purchase from the claimants. I apprehend my colleague is under a mistake. I do not deny that some of them may be; but from our experience in legislation here, I have no doubt that some of them have fallen into the hands of sharpers who are entitled to very little favorable or equitable consideration at the hands of Congress.

Mr. DOWDELL. I know of my own knowledge of instances where several of the employes desired to return home, and a clever, good natured citizen, with the certificates of the Door-keeper and the decision of the Comptroller that the money should be paid, advanced more than $2,600 to these employes, and allowed them to return to their homes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does my colleague know how large a percentage he retained?

Mr. DOWDELL. The interest on the money at six per cent. would be nearly three times as much as he got in the shape of profit.

Mr. HOUSTON. Who was he?

Mr. DOWDELL. Mr. Smithson.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I do not know what profit Mr. Smithson or any of the others made out of these transactions; but I do know that there is no law authorizing the payment of these claims. But let us examine for a moment into the merits of some of these cases. Take, for instance, the case of Mr. Buck. Under this resolution of the House he gets between four and five thousand dollars; and for what, Mr. Chairman? He gets it for doing a part of his duties, and nothing more. He is an officer of this House. He is one of your clerks, and gets, by this bill, between four and five thousand dollars, under the pretense of making out a particular document, which it is the duty of the Clerk to make out and submit to the House, and for which he has already been paid very liberally. He will receive by this bill this amount, for doing no more than the law requires him to do, and which has been required of the Clerk of the House for many years. I do not think my colleague can stand that.

But again: take the case of Mr. Barclay. He will receive, under this bill, between five and six thousand dollars extra compensation; and what is it for? What services has he rendered to entitle him to this extra compensation? I do not pretend to say he is not a good officer. I am not assailing these officers at all. I am only talking about the principle involved. I ask why, and for what, do you vote to give him this large sum of money? Simply because he is a good officer and clever gentleman. Now, so far as the performance of his duties is concerned, he has done no more than the law required him to do, and for which he receives a liberal salary. Then, if you give it to him merely as a matter of gratuity to a clever gentleman, I can tell you that if you will establish the practice of giving $5,000 to every clever gentleman, you can exhaust the Treasury of the country in my district alone, and not get half through giving to the clever gentlemen I have the honor to represent.

Mr. DOWDELL. The last House of Representatives directed the payment of these accounts. The officers had gone on and paid a portion of the amount. Mr. Barclay received a portion of his account. This bill is intended to protect the officer of the House from loss in acting under the order of the House. It is not whether Mr. Barclay, or any other, is entitled to the money, but whether the House will protect an officer who has acted in good faith under an order of the House, and prevent him from suffering loss.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am sorry that my friend has taken up all of my time. I wanted to reply to what he has just said, and show that it has no application to the question involved in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to cavil at appropriations demanded by the necessities of the country. I think it is the duty of Congress, however, carefully to guard their appropriations from misapplication, and limit them strictly to the necessary expenses of the Government. In my judgment, our Government has departed from its original policy in the appropriation of money more than in anything else. And one objection I have to this side of the House, as a political party, is, that we have been too free in the expenditure of money. We have yielded too much to the demands of the Administration. We were at fault, I think, in the last Congress in not watching more carefully, and restricting the expenditures of this Government. We have been abused for it over and over again. Although we did not appropriate one cent more than had been asked for by the Executive, yet for this liberality we have been abused day after day. This morning's Union, the Administration organ, contains a homily on the subject. After charging us with assenting to all the extravagance of this Administration, it warns us to give a ready assent to this new demand.

Mr. Chairman, during the last session of Congress we appropriated for the Army, for one year, the sum of $19,000,000, and now we are asked for the additional sum of $7,925,000; making in all over $27,000,000 for the support of the Army of the United States for one year. I have been looking into the matter to see what are the items of this alleged deficiency. Looking at the bill before us, I can find but few detailed items. I find one single appropriation of $5,000,000 for twenty or thirty different objects. I desired to know how much was needed for each item, and inquired of a member of the Committee of Ways and Means where I could get them, and he referred me to Miscellaneous Document No. 22. From that I am unable to find some of the items. The large sum of near eight million dollars is made up of various items of deficiency, part of which accrued before the 30th of June last, when this fiscal year commenced; $1,228,679 31 now asked for in this bill, is to supply deficiencies which occurred during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last. Why was not this deficiency, which must in a great measure have accrued before the last Congress adjourned, brought to its notice, and an appropriation asked?

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman inquires why this information was not furnished to the last Congress? The gentleman is mistaken in his calculation, or he would not make the inquiry. The last Congress adjourned the 3d of March, 1857. At that time, as I had occasion the other day to remark, the appropriations were made for the ordinary service of the Army, and it was not decided that an expedition should be fitted out for Utah. The gentleman is himself aware of this fact. There was no estimate submitted for sending any portion of the Army to the Territory of Utah. There was a change of Administration in March, and it was left for the present Administration to determine what policy it was necessary to pursue towards the people of Utah. The order was given by this Administration for the march to Utah, and the troops were started before the expiration of the last fiscal year. I hope this is satisfactory.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The answer is such as I expected. Congress adjourned on the 4th of March, and the fiscal year expired on the 30th of June last. The gentleman tells us that this was because the new Administration determined upon the Utah expedition.

Mr. PHELPS. I say the greater part.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. A part, then, accrued before Congress adjourned, and why were we not informed of it? and what right or power had the President to involve the country in this expedition without authority of Congress, and when intelligent men of all parties believe that the expedition could have been avoided by sending commissioners and proper territorial officers. Here is another question which gentlemen will find it difficult to answer. I see, among others, the large item of $129,860 for incidental expenses. What are those expenditures? I have looked into the document, and I find in the appropriations for the last fiscal year $350,000 for incidental expenses. The expenditure amounted to $479,860, making, as it will be seen, a large deficiency. The document to which I have been referred, fails to answer what has been done with this money. How do we know whether this large sum has been properly expended and for what? Nearly a half million for incidental expenses, connected with Quartermaster's department, and yet neither the committee nor the executive documents can give us the items. We are all called on to vote this money in the dark.

Here, sir, are other deficiencies in the last fiscal year, of $279,000, on account of regular supplies, consisting of fuel, forage, &c.; another, on account of barracks and quarters, $67,000; and still another, on account of Army transportation, $751,000. Here is an item of three fourths of a million dollars, in reference to which we have no detailed information. When we ask the Committee of Ways and Means in regard to them, we are referred to a document which gives us no light on the matter. Now, sir, before we appropriate a dollar of money, we should know precisely where the money has gone or is to go. The executive branch of the Government has already nearly swallowed up all others; and not only so, when we attempt to restrain it within constitutional limits, it treats us with indifference. As an example, to which I call the attention of the House, I will refer to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury—and I have a great respect for him personally—in which he confesses to what he and all of us must confess to be, a violation of the law, and makes no apology for it. By the general appropriation bill, passed March 3, 1855, $20,000 was appropriated for the legislative expenses of the Territory of Kansas, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1856; the Administration took the money and expended it in the fiscal year of 1857. This was a violation of law; and, if the example is to be followed, will change the character of our Government. I will ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Secretary.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 5, 1858.

SIR: I transmit herewith a statement from the Register of the Treasury, showing the amount paid out of the Treasury during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, for the compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas and for other expenses of said body, per act of March 3, 1855, as requested in a resolution of the House of Representatives adopted March 1, 1858.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

HOWELL COBB,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker of the House of Representatives, U. S.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

REGISTER'S OFFICE, March 3, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st instant, referred to this office, that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, there was paid out of the appropriation "for the compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly of the Territory of Kansas," per act of March 3, 1855, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1856, viz:

To Daniel Woodson, Secretary.....$5,880 64
To Frederick P. Stanton, Secretary.....3,885 80

In the settlement of the account of Daniel Woodson he was allowed the sum of $10,139 for expenses incurred at the session of the Legislative Assembly, commencing January 12, and ending February 20, 1857; all of which was paid out of the said appropriation; part of which was advanced to the said Woodson during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1856. No account of Frederick P. Stanton in relation to these expenditures has been received in this office.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant

F. BIGGER, Register.

Hon. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, that communication shows this state of facts: that on the 3d of March, 1855, Congress appropriated $20,000 for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1856; and that after this Administration came into power on the 4th of March last, money was paid out of that appropriation into the hands of Secretary Stanton for disbursement in the Territory of Kansas. Not only was that money paid in an entirely different fiscal year from the one for which it was appropriated, but it was done in known violation of, and in opposition to, the action of Congress, because Congress directly, in terms, and after much controversy, refused to make any appropriation for a Legislative Assembly in Kansas; and yet the balance of an old appropriation for a past fiscal year is so applied.

Now, if the executive officers can do these things, and can do them without even deeming them worthy of an apology to Congress, what is the use of Congress? Why not take the unexpended balance of all the various appropriations under laws of Congress and apply it to carry on the Utah expedition? Why come here and ask us for money if we have no power to limit the appropriations? If they can take the money appropriated for one year and apply it for the service of another year, why bring in a deficiency bill at all? Why not lump all that may be needed in one bill, without items and without particularity? I allude to this for the purpose of showing that we ought to require of the executive officers a rigid conformity to law in the expenditure of moneys.

As I said before, I am willing to vote for any appropriation bill that I think is right; but before I vote for this bill, I want some member of the Committee of Ways and Means to inform me what are the items which compose this sum of $129,000? What does it mean? I asked one member of the committee, and he said he had no information on the subject, except what is to be found in an executive document. Now, in my judgment, the Committee of Ways and Means ought to be able to tell us what the items consist of. We ought to have them in detail. But without giving us the items, they tell us it is for a deficiency. I, sir, cannot vote for any bill making appropriations, unless the committee that reports it can give the specific items that make up the aggregate sum.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing in regard to this bill. It is idle for any one to look on the face of the bill for information. I find that in one clause of the bill they have included all sorts of items—for transportation of the Army, including baggage; for sailing vessels on the Gulf of Mexico, and upon the Atlantic and Pacific; for procuring water, and so forth. They have included I do not know how many items, but they have lumped them all together, and appropriated for them $5,400,000. Now, I want to know the amount of each item. According to the original policy of the Government, the amount of each item was given in such bills as this. But in this case, the committee have lumped together the large aggregate amount of $5,400,000, without giving us details. It is our duty as legislators to examine these matters carefully; and the committee should either give us the items or refer us to some public document which contains them. I ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge to point us to some document in which we can find the items which go to make up this large aggregate. I have been looking for it and have not found it. I see that there is probably included in this $5,400,000 about two million dollars for the transportation of troops and supplies. Now, where is the estimate upon which that amount is based? I can find none. How much is paid for transporting a barrel of flour? I have seen it stated in the newspapers that a barrel of flour costs the Government, by the time it reaches Utah, between fifty and sixty dollars.

Mr. LETCHER. In what newspaper did you see that?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I cannot say.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to know.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have heard it said on this floor, and every gentleman here has heard it said. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] how much does it cost?

Mr. LETCHER. Twenty dollars and seventy cents a hundred.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then, I am right, and the paper was right; it will cost between forty and sixty dollars, the barrel and flour weighing about two hundred and fifteen pounds. Well, now, before we are called upon to vote upon this bill, we ought to have the contracts under which these Army supplies are to be transported; we ought to have all the information, I do not care if it covers a hundred pages. We ought to have all the items, or, if we cannot have these in print, the members of the Committee of Ways and Means ought to be able to give us the items, dollar for dollar. Without them we ought not to be called upon to vote for the bill. Who is to get the $2,000,000 for transportation? How were the contracts made? When were they made? By whom were they made? And by what law were such extravagances authorized?

It has been stated here that the ordinary course has not been pursued in making certain contracts in regard to horses. Now, before I vote for this bill, I want to know how the contracts have been made. It is rather suspicious, in my judgment, when you see large amounts for transportation of troops and supplies thus lumped in general terms, and gives some countenance to the general rumors connected with recent Army contracts.

I will ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill another question. If $2,000,000 is appropriated for transportation, why was it not put in the bill specifically? Why is it all grouped together in the sum of $5,400,000? Why are not the separate items given? Under this mode of appropriating money, the executive department can take this $5,400,000, and apply it to more than a hundred different purposes. Under the general terms of an appropriation bill, they can take it and apply it to almost any exigency that an Executive, who has not, in my judgment, the confidence of the nation, may choose to apply it to. I can vote for no appropriation that may be thus abused, when no man can tell how much of it is for transportation, how much for the purpose of clearing roads and removing obstructions from rivers, and how much for the purchase or hire of horses. How can any man vote understandingly for a bill so general in its terms as this is? I am not sufficiently acquainted with the legislative history of the country to say whether or not this kind of appropriation bill is common or ordinary. It seems to me that if it is, the precedents ought not to be followed any further, but that each item of appropriation should stand separated from the others, so that we may vote to strike out what we disapprove, and to retain what we think is right.

But I have another objection to this bill to which I desire the attention of the gentleman who has it in charge. It does not distinguish at all between what is intended for one fiscal year and what is intended for another fiscal year, but, on the contrary, expenditures for three fiscal years are grouped together in the same item of appropriation. Now, is that usual? If it is, it is very wrong. I think it is not usual. The paper, to which I referred before, shows that $1,250,000 of the money is for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of last June, that $3,718,000 is for the current fiscal year, and $3,700,000 for the next fiscal year. Now, why are these items aggregated together and put into one appropriation? Why is not a specific sum appropriated for a specific deficiency in one year and another for a specific deficiency in another year? Such, I am told, has been the custom. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia whether the $3,700,000 for the next fiscal year is not in this bill?

Mr. LETCHER. It is.

Mr. STANTON. For the next fiscal year?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; read the document and you will see.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Yes, sir; I see it. My colleague thought they were not thus grouped together.

Now, in my judgment, those appropriations ought to be separated, and each be made to stand or fall upon its own merits. Some of us may be willing to pay debts for which the faith of the Government is pledged, and yet not be willing to authorize what we consider a useless expenditure for the future. When the Committee of Ways and Means—which has the confidence of the House—reports to us a bill of this kind they ought to separate the items and give them to us item by item, letter by letter, and precept by precept, so that we may act upon them understandingly. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] may think they are all right, and he is generally very exact. I find myself voting with him often on money bills; but we have a right as legislators to know whether or not they are right, to test his judgment and accuracy, and to judge for ourselves.

Now, sir, a few words in reference to the third section of the bill. This third section appropriates money in accordance with resolutions of the last Congress, which, in my opinion, were contrary to law. I believe that the last House of Representatives, in voting extra pay to its various officers, violated an act of Congress. I draw a distinction between resolutions of either House and the law. I believe that these resolutions, passed at the heel of the last session, have not the authority of law, and are wrong in principle; and therefore I will no more vote to sanction what I regard as a breach of law by either House of Congress than I will vote to sanction a breach of law by executive officers. This House has no power to appropriate money, except from its contingent fund. It has no power to say that any man shall have extra pay. There is a law of Congress which expressly forbids it; and therefore I do not consider myself bound to vote to carry out these resolutions. I know that it is said that these men are very worthy officers. I admit it. I do not believe that any Speaker of the House could get along without the services of one of the clerks provided for in this bill. At the same time, I think all these claims should be passed in the ordinary way. Let them not be attached to an appropriation bill. Appropriation bills should contain nothing except for expenditures provided for by law. These claims of Mr. Barclay and the other gentlemen are not provided for by law; they have not been sanctioned by law. It is true, they have been sanctioned by resolutions of the House; but they are not the law of the land; and I will not do, as a member of the House, what I would not sanction to be done by another department of the Government.

This is a small part of the bill; and I think it should be left out, and let the question be taken on the rest. At any rate, until I am better satisfied in reference to the items that make up the large sums appropriated by this bill, I will not vote for it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to correct a statement, or the terms of a statement, made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Housron.] I do not consider that we are called upon merely to pay these gentlemen their extra pay; but we are called upon to carry out in good faith the act of a former Congress; and I consider these resolutions just as binding on us as any one of the laws passed in that Congress. I was in the last Congress, and was one of the few who voted against the resolutions; but as they were adopted, I consider it to be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the money, and the duty of the House to carry out in good faith the acts of the last House.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I cannot yield for the purpose. I do not ask questions of the gentleman, and I shall not answer any.

Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from Alabama puts me in mind of a story that I heard when I was a boy—a good while ago. [Laughter.] When they first undertook to establish courts of justice somewhere, they took a very clever old Englishman and put him on the bench. A man was brought up, charged with murder; but as they had no grand jury in that court, it was considered questionable by the able gentleman who represented the Government, as to whether they could go on with the trial without an indictment; and he suggested it to the court. The court said an indictment was not necessary; that the man was charged with murder, and must be tried. "Well," said the district attorney to him, after hearing the evidence, "I hardly think the evidence sufficient." "That makes no difference," said the judge; "the man has been charged with murder, and we must hang him." "But," said the district attorney, "the man whom he is charged with having murdered, is in court." "That does not make a bit of difference," said the judge; "somebody is to be hung, and I will hang that man any how." So it is with the gentleman from Alabama. He first objects to the indorsement of these accounts, because they were indorsed after the power of the committee had ceased. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] says "No—that is not so; they were signed while the House was in session." "Well," says the gentleman from Alabama, "as they ought not to be paid any how, they ought not to have been signed, and the signing was improper. The committee was not called together, and they must have been signed in the House." The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Nichols] comes forward and relieves him of that difficulty, saying that the committee was called together. "Well," says the gentleman from Alabama, "they were not called regularly. Somebody is to be hung; somebody must be made a scape-goat of."

Now, I do not think that this is right; and I do not think that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is in a better situation than the gentleman from Alabama. He [Mr. Housron] does not intend to vote for this, no matter whether these accounts were regularly signed or not. So the gentleman from Ohio does not intend to vote for the Army deficiencies, whether the supplies were all furnished or not.

There you have the case exactly as it stands; and it is for the thinking portion of the House to do justice. I, for one, believing that these resolutions passed in good faith—although I opposed them—and that these parties are entitled to the money under them, intend to vote to pay them; and believing that it is necessary to carry on this war, and that expeditions have been made by the Government in good faith to further the interests of the country, I shall vote to pay them.

Mr. GARNETT. I will not ask whether the gentleman from Louisiana who has just taken his seat has succeeded as much to the satisfaction of the House as to his own, in proving the justice and propriety of the comparatively small item of the bill giving extra compensation to the officers of the House; but he certainly has said nothing to commend to our approval the $10,000,000 of other appropriations now proposed.

Mr. Chairman, nothing strikes me in this debate so much as the proof it affords of the alarming tendency of the executive branch to absorb the entire power of the Government. For as the Federal Government threatens gradually to consolidate within itself the powers which rightfully belong to the States, so does the Executive concentrate all the powers of the Federation. And nowhere is that encroachment more apparent than in the almost unlimited control it has obtained over the purse.

It was a cardinal principle taught by the State-rights Republicans of Mr. Jefferson's day, that no money should be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriation by Congress, and no expenditures made except by express legislative sanction. By all the minuteness of specific appropriations Congress was to prescribe not only on what objects money might be expended, but how much on each object. Any other construction of the constitutional provision that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, except when appropriated by law, would abandon all our power of control. But it is vain for us to attempt to limit the expenses of Government, if when, after due consultation with the Executive Departments, we have determined the amount we are willing to sanction, the Executive may exceed the limit as far as it pleases, and call upon us to approve the excess, under the name of a deficiency. The Departments first send in their estimates; your Committee of Ways and Means considers them, sometimes reduces them, and but too often merely registers them; Congress itself then deliberates upon them, and the result finally is that by solemn legislative enactment the voice of the people and of the States determines how much shall be spent, and for what purpose. But then the Executive Departments, which have to execute these laws, in utter disregard of them, and at their own mere discretion, contract obligations vastly beyond their authority, spending moneys they never asked for, which were never granted, or which were even refused, and we are summoned by all the ties of party allegiance, and public faith, and governmental necessity, to pay the bills, and sanction the violations of law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to admit that, to a certain extent, deficiencies are unavoidable. I know that, with the greatest prudence and the most cautious desire to conform to the limits of the law, the expenses incurred in any particular branch of the public service may exceed, by a small amount, the sum appropriated, and that, in this way, deficiencies must frequently arise. So far, I would not object. If the Executive Departments show an anxiety to keep the expenditures of the Government within the appropriations by Congress, and their excesses are so small as to be obviously unintentional and accidental, I, for one, have no opposition to make. Such, in theory, are all justifiable deficiency bills; such they may have been in the beginning. But what are they now? I have before me a statement, prepared by an intelligent clerk of this House, showing the amount appropriated in each deficiency bill since 1843.

The first year after the expenses of the Mexican war were fairly cleared from off our annual budget, the deficiency appropriation was only $345,393 71. This was in 1849. But in 1850 it was $2,809,681 63, and, in 1851, rather less—$2,532,035 78. The very next year it more than doubled, and reached $5,486,992 92. The following year it fell to less than two and a half millions, because, meantime, each party had been obliged to bid for the popular favor in the presidential election, by doing what parties often preach, but seldom practice—exercising a little economy. A short-lived reform though, sir; for the next year this deficiency appropriation was $3,696,290 06, and in 1855, it was $5,163,224 13; and in 1856, it reached $5,545,976 20. And even these sums are small, compared with the bill before us, reported by my friend and colleague, [Mr. LETCHER,] which contains near ten million dollars; and I undertake to say that my colleague has now in his desk amendments which will largely increase it. Then when it goes over to the Senate, where they pass everything, and reject nothing, Heaven only knows what it will be. Now, I say, is it right? Is it consistent with the theory of a constitutional republican Government that we should vote under compulsion, as deficiencies, these enormous sums which we refused as original appropriations? The deficiency bill, which, in its origin, was intended to provide for small and unavoidable excesses of expenditures above appropriations, is utterly perverted from its true purpose, and changed into a confirmation of extravagance and disregard of law. What becomes of the legislative power; where is its control over the Treasury if the limits it fixes for expenditure are thus habitually neglected and overstepped? When deficiencies are thus constantly recurring, thus constantly growing, thus enormously large, surely it is time for Congress to interfere, and reclaim some share in the finances of the country! If Congress has fixed the expenditures at $50,000,000, or any other sum, and arranged the taxes, the ways and means, to meet them, is it competent for the Executive Departments, without regard to the law, to spend five, ten, or fifteen million dollars more, and then call upon us to sanction their course, under the name of deficiencies? It would seem that the whole Government is ultimately to be carried on under the title of deficiencies.

I know my friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] will agree with me in the general condemnation of such a practice. But he says that only a part of this bill is for deficiencies, and a part is for future expenditures; and he will also say, that as to the deficiencies themselves, they are for obligations already incurred, and for which public faith is pledged, and that they are necessary to keep the wheels of Government in motion.

Sir, to his first defense, I would reply, so much the worse for his bill. Truth is valuable, even in the mere names of things, and it misleads the public, and weakens the proper responsibility of our financial agents to the people, when we confuse our accounts, and charge our expenses to the wrong year. Nor is this all. You ask us to vote for the deficiencies, and that too with some show of reason, on the ground that they are to meet obligations for which our faith is already pledged; you place them on a footing which would deprive us of the power of revising them. Yet you mix up in the same bill appropriations for the future, over which our power is undisputed, and as to which we should be left perfectly free to act, either to grant or to reject. So serious do I regard this objection, that I think it would be very proper for this committee to recommend to the House to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to separate the deficiency items from all others, and report them in a separate bill. I hope such a motion will be made by my friend himself.

And, sir, when my friend appeals to me on the general grounds of public faith to vote for the deficiencies themselves, I understand him to admit that the Executive Departments ought to strive earnestly to keep within the limits of the lawful appropriations, and that this growing practice of habitually and enormously exceeding them is very bad; that it is, malus usus et abolendus est. At least, his well-known principles must lead him to the same conclusions with my own on this head. I ask him, then, why does he not correct them? When the Committee of Ways and Means ask us to pay these deficiencies and sanction, thereby, the abuses out of which they grow, why do they not propose some remedy, some protection against like abuses in the future? I would appeal to nobody more confidently than my respected colleague [Mr. LETCHER] for such a measure. For we all know his eminent experience and ability, and vigilant care of the interests of the people in an economical administration. If I might suggest to him, and I really do so with diffidence, I would ask him to amend the law of 1820 so as to forbid the Secretaries from making any contracts which would bind us to expenditures beyond the sums actually appropriated. I know that there will be considerable difficulty in applying such a restriction to the quartermaster's or commissary departments; but I would invoke his ample talents to devise safe-guards even there, for there especially is the abuse. I cannot vote for such a bill as this unless it is accompanied by some legislative provisions which promise to guard us against like abuses hereafter; for I know not where it is to end. And it is worthy my friend's anxious inquiry where the money is to be found to support all such expenditures.

I have been at some little pains to ascertain what are the means of the Treasury. I find that, on the 31st of December last, there was a balance in the Treasury of not quite five million dollars. I find that according to the Secretary's estimates, the receipts for the next two quarters can scarcely exceed twenty million dollars, making an aggregate of not quite twenty-five million dollars. Add to this the twenty million dollars of Treasury notes, and you have an aggregate of not quite forty-five million dollars for the service of this fiscal year. Take from that the estimated expenditures for the two remaining quarters, and you have a surplus of not quite eight million dollars. Now put against this surplus my friend's deficiency bill of $12,000,000; put against it the Oregon and Washington Indian war debt, $6,000,000, which, I suppose, our committee will recommend us to pay; put against it the possible and probable appropriations of this and the other House for other things passed; what will be the debt of the United States at the end of this Congress? If the Committee of Ways and Means makes no effort to reduce these expenditures, if we are to go on with such enormous deficiencies; in other words, if the Executive Departments are to continue spending what they please, without regard to the limits we affix, then your loan of $20,000,000 will be altogether insufficient for the wants of Government itself; and before the end of the session you will have another loan bill before you. Perhaps we are obliged to appropriate this money now. Then, I say, at least, give us laws which will protect us against a like extravagance in the future. While you ask us to stand by the abuses of the past, give us a remedy against the extravagance of the future. Is not this reasonable?

Look, sir, at your Army expenses. Look at what I alluded to before, the expenses in the commissary department and the quartermaster's. You will find that the latter has run up from $2,140,000, in 1850, to $5,472,000 in this year; and here is my friend's deficiency bill with $6,700,000 more. This adds up to $12,000,000 for this quartermaster's department for the present year. Where is the fault? Gentlemen of the committee say it is not with us; we have no control over it. It is not in the President; it is not in the Secretary of War; it is not in the quartermaster general, I suppose. Then, who is it? We are referred to the distant forts, the vast frontier lines, and the enormous cost and distance of transportation; and it is said that our little Army has to do the service of one of the great armies of Russia or Austria.

I have compared the statements of the Adjutant General as to the location of our troops on June 30, 1856, and the same day in 1857, and I find that the total necessary displacements of troops during the last fiscal year were only sixteen hundred and seventy; only sixteen hundred and seventy had to be transported from one department to another, to account for the numbers in each at the end of the year! I ask whether this requires such an extraordinary amount of transportation? It may be that your Army is not large enough. Some gentlemen have said so, though my friend, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, was not of that opinion when he reported the volunteer bill, and we all feel, with the country at large, how much weight is due to the judgment of such a man. But admit that the Army is too small, and still I would inquire, is its efficiency increased by constantly traveling, by land and sea, thus perpetually wasting time and strength and money, instead of keeping them at their posts? And I cannot avoid wondering at the location of some of these posts, though I am no military man. They are not only on the frontier, but beyond it. For instance, there is Fort Simcoe: one of the officers recently told me that there was not a white settlement within fifty or one hundred miles, and the country itself probably never will be settled! I can see how the expenses are increased by this system, but not how the efficiency of the Army is improved. When I show by the official papers that the necessary displacements in one year were only sixteen hundred and seventy men from one department to another, how is it possible for this House to believe that these enormous expenditures of $12,000,000 can be just and proper?

I might go much further, Mr. Chairman, and pursue this inquiry with greater detail, and into other branches. But I shall have accomplished my purpose if I have assisted in arousing the attention of this House to the urgent necessity for greater economy and a stricter accountability in those who control our finances. Our Government is fast becoming one of the most expensive and least responsible in the world; and unless Congress means to abandon and surrender all its constitutional functions, it is high time for it to apply some remedy to this system of deficiencies and expendtures without authority of law. No time better than the present to check abuses, to remedy admitted evils, and to take a new departure. Let us couple these appropriations with wholesome and remedial legislation, and I call upon my excellent and valued friend, who has charge of this bill, to take the lead. Let him not confine himself to the mere work of sanctioning the past—let him provide for the future; the country will thank him, and we are all ready to give him our confidence and support, and follow him in the path of reform.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia has expressed some views on this subject which it was my intention to lay before the committee. I intend to vote against this bill. It is a kind of omnibus bill. It is a log-rolling concern embracing items of every description. Those of us who are disposed to vote for necessary appropriations for the Government, are compelled to vote against them because they are found in such bad company. There are items here which ought not to be here, and there are others which ought to be greatly reduced.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not time to refer to all the points involved. I desire to confine myself alone to a matter with which perhaps I am better acquainted than with others. I will in particular make a reply to some remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS.] I do not want to defend myself or others who have heretofore made allowances under these extra-compensation resolutions. It is enough that they are now decided to be illegal. The gentleman seems to be resolved to adhere to precedent, whether the precedent is good or bad. If the gentleman's party had adhered to precedent so closely it would not have stepped from its Philadelphia platform to vote for the admission of a slave State. On that platform the gentleman and other Republicans resolved never to vote for the admission of another slave State. His whole party has gone against that platform, and have voted to admit a slave State into the Union. Not only that; some of his American colleagues have voted—for what?

Mr. SEWARD. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. MASON. I am only illustrating my point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see how the gentleman's remarks are in order.

Mr. MASON. I am showing in this way that the position the gentleman has taken is not a consistent or a good one. He referred to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, when a member of the Committee of Accounts, and others, allowed these claims for extra compensation under a resolution of the House. So did I; but I say now that the best way is to put a stop to any further allowances by yielding obedience to the recent decision of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the legality of the practice. The gentleman has changed the whole practice of his party on the slavery question, and why should he not change it here, to stop extravagant expenditure?

Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen have argued—and that was the ground taken by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS.]—that this is res adjudicata—a law passed beyond redemption—and that these men are legally entitled to this money. The gentleman from Ohio says that we are acting unjustly to these employes in refusing to pay them, although the employes of the Senate have been paid; and I understood him to intimate that it was because the employes of the last House were Americans and Republicans—that the Democratic House is not willing to pay them this extra compensation. Sir, I do not act from party considerations. I oppose all illegal, unjust, and unauthorized appropriations for the benefit of any party—my own as well as any other. But when will the time ever come when we can put a stop to these allowances? When I was here, some six years ago, we passed a law to put a stop to this system; and in the teeth of that law of the Senate and House these accounts have been allowed. And it is because it is illegal that the question comes up here to-day, and you are called upon to sanction this system. But we have got you where we can have a vote by yeas and nays, and where, if gentlemen vote to squander the public money in this way, their constituents will at least know it.

Now, sir, I have no disposition to be thought hard-hearted, any more than any other gentleman. I have no antipathy to any of these employes, past or present. They have done me many favors, and I have reciprocated them. I have no desire to cut them out of any money to which they are justly entitled. But have they a legal right to the money which the Committee of Ways and Means provide for paying them in this third section of the bill? I say they have none, because you are called upon now to give them a legal right to it. They cannot get this money unless you pass a law for that purpose. The question for you now is, whether you will pass such a law or not; and not whether others have passed it? I have heard no gentleman defend this provision because it is just and proper. If the clerks and employes in the legislative department are to have two or three hundred dollars apiece, and from that up to $4,000, why has not every clerk in the executive and judicial departments in Washington city a right to the same amount? why is not every individual in the United States entitled to the same amount? You certainly do the executive and judicial employes in this city injustice unless you pay them the same amount. Do the executive employes receive higher salaries than those here? Here is the Blue Book. The messenger at the War Department gets $900 a year, and the assistant messenger $600. You pay your messengers here $1,500 a year, and the assistant messengers $1,200. Do they perform more service than the executive employes? They are employed here for only eleven months in every two years—about eight months in one year, and three months in the next; and you know how long each day; and yet you pay them nearly twice as much as is paid to the messengers at the executive departments, who have to work all the year round, and six hours a day.

And now what does this bill propose to do? It proposes, after you have given the clerks, messengers, and employes their regular salaries for serving three months during the last session of Congress and twenty per cent. on top of that, to give them from two hundred and forty to three hundred dollars apiece more. I am told that some of these offices are perfect sinecures. I will give you one or two instances. I take the case of Cornelius Adams, librarian of the last House of Representatives. He got last year $1,800 as his salary. The messenger to the librarian—the messenger who serves you in the room there—got $1,200. The librarian had about as little to do as any one in the city, and he got $1,800 for the year; he got twenty per cent. on top of that for doing nothing; and now the Committee of Ways and Means propose to give him $300 more for doing less than nothing. [Laughter.] There is no law for it. You make it the law by voting for it here, and that is the only way in which he can get the money. The Secretary of the Treasury has very properly endeavored to stop this thing. He tells you it is not legal, and no gentleman here can contend that it is legal. Gentlemen refer to old precedents, and they have attacked the Secretary of the Treasury because ten years ago, when he was a member of the Committee of Accounts of this House, he voted to give a disbursing clerk eight or nine hundred dollars. For what? For disbursing the contingent fund? As I understand the facts, it was for a sum of money that he had lost; that had been taken by somebody or there had been a miscount in some way, and as he was a very honest man the committee made it up to him. I understand that subsequent committees have supposed that to be a customary allowance and have held that it was a precedent. That is the way precedents begin, and they ought to end there. As for this librarian, he has already had $1,800 for his three months' service, and twenty per cent. on that. I do not care what party he belongs to. I do not know. I am not acquainted with the individual. But he got $3,600 for two years and then $300 on top of that for one session; and now, gentlemen, in this Congress seem to be disposed to raise heaven and earth to give him $300 more. And yet, if you come here with a petition from some poor man in your district to get an honest claim of $300 allowed, these same gentlemen will oppose it and fight it through every stage of the proceeding.

Well, then, there were fourteen pages regularly employed in the last House who got their two dollars a day—fully as much as a boy of ten or twelve years of age is worth; but, besides that, at the end of the three months' session, they got $200 each voted to them as extra compensation. Now, we have got as likely boys at the West as there are anywhere; and why not, if two dollars a day and $200 extra compensation is to be given to boys, make a fair division and include them? You might as well do it as make these allowances to your pages. I ask, are you doing justice to the people and to your constituents when you squander the public money in this unceremonious way without law?

Nor is that all. Besides these fourteen pages allowed by law, there were eleven other boys brought on the floor during the session; and a resolution was adopted giving them two dollars a day from the commencement of the session, and $200 extra compensation.

Then here are nine clerks employed in the land-map business; one with a salary of $2,160, and the rest with salaries of $1,800. They have actually nothing whatever to do. What are they for? When a section or half a section or a quarter section of the public lands is sold, and the sale is reported to the Land Office here, these clerks draw a red or a blue line through the section on the map, and that is all. The maps are not referred to by twenty out of every million of people in the country. And yet, these clerks, with their already large salaries, have had twenty per cent. added to their salaries; and you are called upon to vote for this or else vote down the necessary appropriations of the Government. I can bring facts and figures to show you that three fourths of the employes about this Capitol can be dispensed with, without detriment to the public service.

Look at this printed Calendar; you pay as much for these blank sheets at the end and these blank sheets in the middle as you do for what is printed inside. You pay the printer sixteen dollars instead of one dollar. So it is with all the blanks; and it is the same with everything else. The paper maker makes the profit on the paper; and the printer on the printing; and thus millions of the public treasure are squandered. There is not, in the whole wide range of executive expenditures, anything approaching the wasteful expenditure of the legislative branch of the Government; and you, the Representatives of the people, whose duty it is to guard the public Treasury, stand here and countenance this wholesale robbery of it.

Nor is that the only evil: by your wasteful extravagance, hundreds and thousands of office-seekers are attracted here from various parts of the country, and not being able to get into office, they become foot-pads and murderers, and so infect the city that you have to embody a police force to protect citizens from murder and robbery.

The third section directs the accounting officer of the Treasury to allow credit to the Clerk of the House for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been, or may be made, under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress. You pay $1,700 salary to men in your document-room, when you can get thousands of good men to do the same work for $1 50 a day. After getting their regular salaries, as originally provided, they then get their twenty per cent. increase pay, and then comes in the twenty per cent. which we are now asked to appropriate. Now, my friend from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS.] has gone into an able argument to show the validity of the resolution voting this extra compensation. He says they have been paid the money voted to them.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky one question. I desire to know whether, if he had been a member of the Committee of Accounts when these resolutions passed, he would have disregarded the order of the House, and declined to audit them?

Mr. MASON. I would have audited them, having voted against the resolutions in the House. But they have not been passed at the Treasury Department, and now the Secretary of the Treasury requests you to pass upon them again, when you have got clear of the wine and oysters of the last night of the session.

There is another point upon which I desire to say a word. It is argued that the late Clerk of the House has paid the sums voted in these resolutions. Now, sir, there is not a dollar paid under this general resolution for extra compensation. Gentlemen may tell me that these certificates are hawked about town, and it may be, for anything I know, that they have been bought up for ten cents on the dollar. Whoever may have bought them, or whatever the employes themselves may have received, the Clerk has not paid them, and the Clerk will not lose it. I ask, then, why vote for paying this money, if you do not intend to sanction the keeping up of these sinecure offices and the payment of extra compensation to the officers? If gentlemen want to know what money has actually been paid under these resolutions, I will tell them: about eleven hundred dollars.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Kentucky has made a mistake of about fifteen thousand dollars.

Mr. MASON. If you will leave it out of this bill and go before the Committee of Claims, I will show you that I am not mistaken.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SEWARD. Ever since I have been in Congress I have been opposed to our whole system of legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir, two of them.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I want to know if the gentleman is also opposed to the institutions of the country?

Mr. SEWARD. Public or private? [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the appropriation of money to pay these clerks and employes of the House I consider a question of good faith upon the part of this House. The House cannot consistently decline to make the appropriation without indorsing the odious doctrine of repudiation. Why, sir, millions of the money of this Government have been spent under simple resolutions of the respective Houses of Congress. Prior to the passage of the general appropriation bills, your clerks have bought books and distributed to the members of the House, to the amount of two or three hundred thousand dollars every year, and you might as well say that we should repudiate that as to repudiate this. At the last session of Congress your Clerk bought some books before the appropriation was made for that purpose, and Congress, acting in good faith, ratified the purchase as far as the Clerk had gone.

Now, sir, I hold that while it was not a law—for neither House can of itself pass a law—yet, sir, as it has been the custom of the House to give this extra compensation to its employes, you cannot escape paying this money without a violation of your honor. I do not pretend to say that the amount given to some of these employes is not extravagant. I think it is excessive. But as to one of the clerks alluded to, the one at your desk and one in the Clerk's office, I think they are the worst paid men about the Government. The business of this House could not be well carried on without them; and their compensation, in my opinion, instead of being too much, ought to be made equal to that of the Speaker of the House.

Let us look at the matter for a moment. Here are the employes of this House, men who labor for us, men who hunt up documents and examine Journals, make out written statements, and labor, week in and week out, for the accommodation of the members; and they are selected to be the victims by the very men who receive their kindness. And, I say, the clerks do more than their duty in getting up information here for members, in furnishing extracts, in hunting up authorities; and they are frequently called upon by members even to draft bills for them, to be introduced into the House. And yet these are the men whom gentlemen say shall not be paid.

Now upon the faith that the House would pay them this increased compensation, I have no doubt these men have regulated their expenses in the way of living. Members of this House know very well that Washington is an extravagant place to live in, and that since the passage of the new compensation bill they spend a good deal more money than they did when they received only eight dollars per day. These gentlemen have no doubt regulated their own living in accordance with the promises of the House to pay them, and now it is proposed that we shall not pay them, and that they shall meet their engagements out of the small salaries we pay them. It is not honest to refuse to pay them. That is my opinion, and on that ground I shall vote to pay this money.

I said that I was opposed to the whole system of legislation of this country, and I propose to give the reason for it. Your rules are radically wrong. They were molded to bring about a concurrence between the heads of Departments and the committees manufactured in this House to carry out political purposes. It may not be known, but it is true, that half of the appropriation bills which are presented in this House are got up in the Departments with marginal notes and the authorities referred to, and are brought here to carry out the edicts of those Departments. When the appropriations are here ready to be acted on, your rules say you shall not put anything on them unless it is to carry out some preëxisting law. This whole system in regard to deficiencies is wrong. This ought to have been a bill providing for the payment of the debts of the Government. It is not a deficiency. I do not care what becomes of the Army bill. I am not concerned, because I do not think it is necessary to get into a difficulty with Brigham Young. I think the whole expense might be stopped. I think that everything connected with our Army is got up on a too magnificent scale. I want a law passed that no man connected with the Army shall come to this city unless by a special order, and a statement of the reason on the part of the Secretary which induces him to bring him here. I want to keep them away from here to prevent them manufacturing these schemes of extravagance. If we want to correct these defects let us blot out the rules, because no man on this floor can be a Representative of his constituency under them. He has to go to the Speaker every morning, like a man in love has to visit his sweetheart, in order to get any favor. Every man has to go to the Speaker for the purpose of getting the floor. You all know that kissing goes by favor here. [Laughter.] Sometimes the Speaker gets in the chair and he has a wry neck, and he directs his head to one side of the House, and you might cry until doomsday and he will not hear you. When a matter is to be carried out and has been agreed upon by certain friends, then the rules are subverted. Why, sir, you will find on your Journal decisions to sustain anything in the world except what is right, and I do not think you will find a decision there for that purpose. There may be an exception, however, and that is when I make a point which is decided in my favor. [Laughter.] I should like to see a committee raised to revise these rules.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing. I would make it a penal offense for any member of Congress to write a letter to a head of Department for information. The Constitution never contemplated any such system. When the President communicates to either branch of Congress at the opening of the session, his duty is performed; and all your legislation imposing certain duties on the heads of Departments, to make estimates, and send them into these Houses, is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution. I wish there was a wall between them that could not be scaled, and with nothing but a little hole to get through when it was absolutely necessary that any body should go through. It is this system which begets this extravagance. A thing occurs in Congress, and a member writes to a Department. He gets an answer. Then, sir, he gets up in this House and reads it, and it is spread upon your record. The records are crowded all over with them, and we have to pay for them. I hope that will be cut off. I hope my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Mason] will give it his attention. I refer to my friend, who made a speech this morning, which, like the preacher's prayer, had in it everything in the world, and the suburbs thereof. [Laughter.] We ought to have a law passed preventing the printing of these letters, &c., from the Departments, in the Globe. If we did we would save more than sixteen hundred or ten thousand dollars. That is a great deal. I do not want to hear from the Departments. I want the Capitol removed from them, or they from the Capitol. I want to get clear of them.

Mr. MASON. Does the gentleman allude to me as having written letters to the Globe? [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; I say that a considerable amount of money could be saved by prohibiting the receipt of letters from the Departments and their being printed in the Globe. I said the gentleman ought to look to this, if he wants to economize the Government expenditures.

Mr. MASON. Make the motion, and I will vote for it.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman strikes at little matters. He does not want to pay the clerks. He will take his $3,000 a year, and voted for the bill under which he and myself get that much a year; and I do not regret that vote. But this thing of the clerks' compensation, I think, is a small matter to be serious about. Then there are these little boys here. Most of these are orphans. We are apt, too, to complain because we do not get a boy appointed, whom we wish to get a place for. I tried to get a boy appointed, and the Doorkeeper said he could not appoint him. I was satisfied with that. I have put nobody in office here from my State, that I know of. We make war sometimes on the officers of the House, because we cannot get offices for those of our friends who want them. Let us furnish them with authority, and they will furnish those we want with places. But all this does not furnish us with an excuse for not paying our honest debts.

Mr. MASON. Does the gentleman say I have complained?

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman talked about little boys in the West. He wanted to have them provided for. I do not want anybody from the South to come here and ask for office. It is the most demoralizing place in the world; and the very moment a man gets here he becomes tainted. A man cannot take care even of his own boys. If we keep on doing as we have, we shall soon have a nation of paupers. Our people are being taught that the Treasury is a sort of almshouse, and that they have the right to come here and fasten themselves on it. Instead of teaching them that they are to sustain the Government, the lesson taught is that the Government will sustain them. I do not want the people of the South, and especially of Georgia, to look to Washington to be fed. They can find at home honorable and remunerative employment, and there their morals will not be corrupted.

I have little more to say. I ask this House, in good faith, to pay these its employes the money which is honestly due them. Do not let us commence economy by striking at these men, who are poor, and who live upon their salaries, when millions are demanded from other quarters and voted.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia, in the opening of his remarks, uttered a sentiment which I heartily indorse; and it is, that there is an evident and growing disposition, on the part of the executive department of the Government, to absorb all of the powers of the legislative branch. This is evidenced in the history of the few preceding Congresses. We find that this system of deficiency bills is rapidly growing; and that, unless it is checked by the legislative department of the Government, there is no telling where it will end.

We have a deficiency bill here of over eleven million dollars, and, as was well remarked by some gentleman who preceded me, before we get through with it no man can tell what will be the amount of it. I appeal to gentlemen here, not as a partisan, but I ask each gentleman who represents a constituency upon this floor, whether we should not pause and consider well the question whether we will not check this thing when we have the power? What do you find in this bill? You find a deficiency for the Army of between three and four million dollars, with an anticipated appropriation of nearly five millions dollars. Now, when the friends of the Administration talk to me about this being a party measure, I ask them if we should not at least make the appropriations in accordance with the rules of the House and the laws upon the statute-book? Shall we put into deficiency bills that which does not properly belong to them? Shall we anticipate appropriations amounting to millions of dollars which are not even claimed to be deficiencies?

Now, sir, I will go as far as any gentleman upon this floor to correct the abuses which exist in Utah. I am in favor of using the strong arm of the Government for the purpose of suppressing the outrages existing in that Territory. I say that it is our duty, as the Representatives of the people, to do it. But I say that, when the Committee of Ways and Means come in here with a bill making appropriations of nearly eight millions of dollars for the Army, over and above the annual appropriations for the Government, we should know how the money is to be expended, and why this large increase of the annual appropriation. They do not tell us that it is all for deficiencies. Why not put it, then, in separate bills in accordance with the existing law and usage of the body? Why put it all in a deficiency bill and claim it as a deficiency when there is really only a deficiency of between three and four million dollars? I believe that is the amount, although I have not estimated it particularly.

What else do we find, sir, in this bill? Gentlemen get up here and ask us why we strike at small matters, and why we do not strike at millions. Sir, it is the principle, and not the amount that I care for. Our sympathies are appealed to. We are asked to vote this money for the employes about this Capitol because they are gentlemen, and are courteous and polite, and they have treated us courteously and politely—at least that has been my experience. But we are told that we make war upon these little boys, and upon the clerks who get up statistics and facts for the House. Sir, it is part of their duty to do so; and I say now, if these gentlemen are not satisfied with their salaries, let them vacate their offices. I hold to the doctrine that there is as good material in the country, out of which to make public officers, as there is in office; and that there is no man employed under the Government whose place cannot be supplied. You tell me about the efficiency of these clerks. I grant you that they are efficient. I grant you that they have discharged their duties faithfully and efficiently. But is that any reason why you should put your arms into the public Treasury, and by a species of favoritism—for it is put upon no other ground—take from the public Treasury money to put into the pockets of these men? And for what? For services which they rendered to the country? No, sir; but as a bonus, as a mere bonus, and nothing more.

Gentlemen have referred us to precedents. I care nothing for precedents where they are wrong and in violation of law. Let me recall to the recollection of gentlemen who were then here, the manner in which these resolutions were passed at the last Congress. I say here that it was disgraceful, and I do not use too strong a word. How were they passed? I well remember that when on the 3d day of March, 1857, the resolution was offered here to give extra compensation to the employes about the Capitol, various gentlemen rose and asked members to give us the yeas and nays upon the proposition; but we were frowned down and refused the yeas and nays. We were told it was a small matter. When we were called upon to violate the law and appropriate money which we had no authority to do, we were told that it was a small matter.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the act of a former Congress put any restraint upon the last Congress, and that we had no right to pass the resolution?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; I say that the resolution which was passed has been declared by the Secretary of the Treasury to be in conflict with law, and that this House had no power to pass such a resolution, there being a law upon the statute-book which forbid the appropriation of the contingent fund of the House for such a purpose.

I will read the gentleman what the Secretary of the Treasury says:

"If I could find any evidence that the question had been the subject of serious consideration, and an opinion pronounced formally upon it, and acquiesced in, I should hesitate long before resorting to a new construction of the law. But such is not the case; and I am so fully impressed with the wisdom of the law, and the clearly expressed purpose of Congress to make it permanent, that I must require its enforcement."

Mr. SEWARD. As I understand it, the Secretary of the Treasury based his decision upon the law fixing the salaries of these officers; and the reason why he would not pay this extra compensation was, because it was not incorporated in an appropriation bill, but merely in a resolution of the House itself, which is not a law. I admit that.

Mr. BURNETT. Then we do not disagree at all. You have to give vitality to your resolution, by an act of Congress, before you can draw the money from the public Treasury. I say that your resolution was wrong in its inception; that it was void ab initio; and, therefore, when you undertake to give it vitality by an act of Congress, you violate your duty.

Mr. LETCHER. I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman at that point. It will probably help his argument.

Mr. BURNETT. I know my friend would argue this question with much more ability than I can do; but I prefer to do my own speaking.

Mr. LETCHER. I merely want to state a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to say, in regard to these extra-compensation resolutions, that I am not one of those who are responsible for their passage. During the short period of my service here, I have been opposed to these things; but when we have called for the yeas and nays, so that we might put ourselves on record, and let the country know who it is that votes away the money, we could not get a corporal's guard to stand up. Why is it that, out of two hundred and thirty-odd gentlemen, we cannot get enough to order the yeas and nays? Gentlemen come round and tell us that we must not complain about small matters. Sir, if the pay of these clerks is not sufficient, increase it. If the pay of the messengers and pages is not enough, increase it. But I ask gentlemen whether it is right, at the close of a session of Congress, for us to pass resolutions attempting to appropriate money out of the public Treasury to these men as a bonus—for it amounts to nothing else.

Now, we have had precedents referred to. I do not charge this thing upon any particular party here. It has been the course of members of all parties upon this floor. But your precedent is not worth a cent, if it is wrong. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] expressed the opinion that this provision, which was incorporated in the act of 1854, was a mere limitation. Did he give any reason for it, further than his mere opinion? Here is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury—upon whom the gentleman relied as an authority for the passage of this third section of the bill, and he tells you, and I indorse the opinion fully, that there is no doubt it was intended to be a permanent provision; he so construed it.

Now, let me call attention to another fact. I admit that the employes here are efficient and faithful. I make no war upon them. But we have been told that these men have been paid. Have these messengers and employes been paid? No, sir; not a dollar of this extra compensation have they been paid. But I grant that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DOWDELL] gives us a case here which may have some equity in it. He says that the person who bought up these claims paid, including interest on the advance, more than the amount of the extra compensation. But it is a notorious fact that these claims were hawked about here in Washington, and that the sharpers who hang around the Capitol here are the men who are now clamorous for this money.

Under the resolutions voted, you gave to Mr. Barclay, by the last section of the bill, $5,906 97; you gave to Mr. Buck $4,320; to another you gave $1,748; to another, $2,652; and to others numerous sums of a less amount. You are not told that the law authorizes this; you are asked to put it in the deficiency bill so as to enable these gentlemen to draw the money from the Treasury. Now, I ask every member of the House what justice is there in this? These gentlemen have discharged their duties at salaries fixed by law, and now you are asked to put your hands into the Treasury and make them these extra appropriations; and though they do not amount in all to more than twenty-five thousand dollars, I ask if it is right for us to do it. Have these gentlemen any claims, equitable or legal, on Congress for this money? None whatever. I say that the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] is a good one; that this bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions. I can never give my assent or my vote to a bill which contains in it provisions of this character.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, there are questions presented by this bill of very great magnitude. There may be objections to various features of the bill. I am, however, not one of those who are disposed to take exception to the appropriation proposed to be made in the third section, which contemplates paying the employes of the House; or to others of a similar character, in other parts of the bill.

But there is an objection existing in my mind with regard to another portion of this bill, which will compel me to vote against it. I would be disposed to vote for an appropriation for the payment of these employes, although I voted against the resolution granting them that extra compensation. I should be inclined to make no difficulty in regard to carrying out an implied obligation growing out of the action of my brethren who were members of the last House. But there is an important principle involved in our action on this bill. I conceive that that principle is one which lies at the very foundation of all good government, and that if we go on and recognize the mode of action proposed to be adopted now, we are laying the foundation of unnumbered evils.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] gave utterance to much that I heartily approve. The theory of our Government, as he well said, is isolated by this proceeding. It is intended, under our system, that Congress should carry on the public business; that Congress should make provision for what is to be done, and that it should regulate the expenditures of the Government. It is not designed that the executive branch of the Government of the United States should go further than to execute the laws. The giving it motion, and the shadowing out of the policy of the nation is confided to the Congress of the United States. It is that body that is to determine what is necessary for the public service. It is that body that is to determine what the public interests require should be undertaken. It is the duty of that body to provide the means for carrying on the particular enterprises which it sees fit to determine on carrying on. And, sir, it is a fundamental principle of our Government that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States, except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. The power of taxation, of raising revenue, is vested in Congress alone. It is the peculiar function of the Congress of the United States to devise the means of raising the funds necessary for carrying on the public service, to fill the public Treasury, and to determine for what purposes, at what times, and in what manner the disbursements of the public treasure shall be made. Congress provides an Army. Congress provides the various means of carrying on the public business. It is the duty of the Executive to give effect to the laws of Congress. It is the duty of the Executive to expend the public funds, under the authority of law, for the purpose of carrying out the designs of Congress, of giving effect to the public policy which Congress has determined shall be carried out.

But, Mr. Chairman, the executive department of the Government has no independent, original power over the public affairs of the nation. When the appropriations made by Congress are exhausted, the Executive cannot go on to make further expenditures out of the public Treasury. Nor is he authorized to change the whole scheme and course of administration at his discretion, so as to augment the public expenditures in such a manner as to expend in one part of the year what was intended to supply the public wants during the whole of the year. Such a course is in violation of the fundamental principle of the public administration of a republican government. Its whole frame-work, all its provisions and checks, were devised and contrived to prevent any necessity for anything of the sort. It is the province of Congress to look at the posture of the public business; to ascertain what the exigencies of the public service will require, and to provide for them. When, in view of what it is presumed will be the state of things during the year, the Congress of the United States has made certain appropriations, and something not contemplated occurs so that the appropriations are sooner exhausted than was expected when they were made, will any one pretend to say that it is compatible with the genius of our institutions, or with the principles on which the Government is founded, for the Executive still to continue to employ the public treasure without the authority of law? No, sir; our Con-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 95.

stitution provides the remedy for such a contingency. When any new necessity arises for the expenditure of money not contemplated before, when any exigency arises in the public service such as requires the expenditure of money not appropriated, it is within the power of the Executive of the United States to call Congress together again. I conceive that when occasions arise for the expenditure of money in addition to that which had been laid aside for that part of the public service, it is the duty of the Executive to call Congress together, and not to exercise his discretionary power.

Now, sir, what is the principal feature presented in this deficiency bill? The bill proposes to draw from the public Treasury nearly eight millions dollars for the military service of the United States. And for what? It proposes to appropriate now $8,000,000 over and above the sums appropriated to that branch of the public service by the last Congress. And why? Because of the extraordinary expenditure caused by the undertaking of various military expeditions which were not looked forward to, or provided for, by Congress. I see that large sums of money are called for for the purchase of supplies for regiments of dragoons; large sums of money are called for to supply deficiencies in respect to the quartermaster's department. Now, sir, I say it was the duty of the President of the United States when the necessity arose, or when in his view the necessity arose, which would make it proper to employ the Army of the United States upon a distant service, which would involve the expenditure of vast sums of money for the purchase of munitions of war and supplies—a necessity which had not been contemplated—it was, I say, according to my opinion, the duty of the President—it was the only course which could have been properly pursued—to have called together the Congress of the United States, and submitted to them the extraordinary circumstances which had arisen.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the gentleman if he desires to convey the impression that this is an item contained in this appropriation bill for Army expenses which has not been sanctioned by law? In other words, whether one single item of expense has been incurred by the War Department that has not been in pursuance of law?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I do not mean to say that any expense has been incurred that has not been in pursuance of law. But I do mean to say that immense expenditures have been made which were not contemplated by the Congress of the United States when the appropriations were made at the last session of Congress, and that this change in the nature and rate of the expenditures, by executive authority, has created the deficiency to be supplied.

Now, I understand that a large portion of these deficiencies have arisen in consequence of calls upon the Treasury for the transportation of troops on a service not contemplated when the appropriations for the service of the present year were made. I understand that a large portion of these deficiencies have grown out of the expedition to Utah.

Mr. FAULKNER. Does not the law, in express terms, looking to such a contingency, vest in the head of the War Department power to incur these expenses? and were they not all incurred, therefore, in pursuance of law?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I do say that emergencies may occur when the public officers are justified in incurring extraordinary expenses, and when they may with propriety take the responsibility. Circumstances may arise when it may devolve upon the officers of the Government, in the absence of Congress, to furnish additional men and munitions of war for the military service; but in my opinion, an occasion of that imperious character which requires action before Congress can be called together, can only arise upon the emergency of an actual invasion of the country. I say, sir, that the Executive of the United States should not take into his own hands the powers confided by the Constitution to the legislative branch of the Government, upon any other emergency, but should call that legislative branch—the two Houses of Congress—together, and submit to them whether or not a contingency had arisen when it was requisite or proper to adopt a different course of policy from that before pursued; and whether, if they concurred with him as to the wisdom of a change of policy, it would not require an augmentation of the military force of the country; and if it was the purpose to engage in distant military operations, whether they would not determine what additional expenditure of the public treasure should be made for their prosecution?

Now, sir, I recognize in the executive agents of the Constitution, I recognize in the President of the United States, the perfect authority to make use of the means placed at his disposal in the event of an invasion of the country, or in the event of there being an imperious necessity requiring the immediate exercise of the military force of the country. But I deny the authority of the Executive to exercise a discretion which involves the adoption of a course of policy which will lead to an expenditure of the public treasure, it may be an incalculable amount, upon his mere notion, when there is no pressure of time, and when every circumstance is such as not only to make it proper, but to make it more than proper, to make it his duty, to submit the question to the coordinate department of Government, to which is committed the power of making war and establishing peace; in which is vested the sole power of raising revenue, and of raising and of supporting armies.

Now, sir, it was not my purpose to have said much upon this subject, but it was my wish to present this particular view. I say it is my deliberate conviction that the exercise, upon the part of the Executive, of any such discretion, at any time, is opposed to the principles of our Government; is opposed to the spirit of our Constitution; is opposed to the genius of republican institutions. I say that, for one, I think the public interest, the interest of the whole people of the United States, requires that the principle should be recognized, that while it is the peculiar province of the Executive to enforce the laws, it is the exclusive province of the Congress of the United States to determine the public policy of the country. And, sir, I will go further, and say that if we desire to prevent the violation of that principle, and to prevent the assumption of power upon the part of the Executive, we must reject this bill. I, for one, am disposed to vote against any appropriation which grows out of the exercise of powers vested in Congress, and which should never be exercised by the Executive except in those great emergencies which brook no delay. That is the principle which I wish to present, and that is the position in which I wish to place myself.

Mr. FAULKNER. Almost the whole of the appropriations embraced in the Army deficiency bill can be embraced under two heads—those which relate to the ordinary expenses of the Army, and those which relate to the Utah expedition. Now, do I understand the gentleman from Louisiana to say that he would be willing to defeat that part of this bill which nerves the arm of the Executive, and thus compel him to abandon the policy which he proposes to pursue in regard to Utah?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I am not prepared to say, in the present posture of affairs, what would be my course in such a contingency as that stated by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. That would be the effect of the defeat of this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I can make no appropriation which relates to Utah, with the facts before me, without the violation of a principle which I regard as fundamental; nor will I, because of the exigency of the public service, fail, by my vote, to show my disapprobation of all violations of that principle of action.

With respect to the provision to be made for the prosecution of the Utah war, I voted for the bill which passed this House. I would vote to make any appropriation which is necessary for the purpose of carrying on that branch of the public service; but I will not sanction by my vote the appropriation proposed to be made, under circumstances which implies the right of the President of the United States to inaugurate a new policy when there is no public necessity, and when there is nothing to prevent his calling together the bodies in which the constitutional power of this Government over the subject is vested, for the purpose of sitting in judgment upon that necessity, and of providing beforehand the means necessary to carry out the policy they determine on—which they think should be adopted.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will you vote him an army and deny him money to support the army?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I will vote men now, but I will not vote for an appropriation, at this time, to supply deficiencies which were created by what I conceive to be an unwarranted exercise of the executive power.

Mr. LETCHER. If that was unwarranted on the part of the President, why did not the gentleman and others, by the action of this House, repudiate that act?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. The prosecution of a war in which we are engaged is one thing; the declaring of that war is another. I can easily understand—and it is for that reason that I plant myself upon this principle—that this great nation can be engaged in a war by the improper assumptions of the Executive power. And, sir, it is upon such occasions as this that Congress must rebuke all such assumptions, if we would avoid greater evils in the future. But while I would condemn these assumptions, while I would condemn the President of the United States who should venture to exercise the power intrusted to him for no such purpose, yet, after we were engaged in the war, I, for one, should be inclined to prosecute it to a successful termination. Now, sir, there has nothing transpired recently in Utah which, in my opinion, made it necessary for the Executive to act in hot haste. The condition of things existing in that Territory which, it is alleged, led to the setting on foot of this expedition, which has caused this deficiency, it is notorious was in existence for the last three years. There was nothing to prevent the President from waiting for the meeting of Congress. If there were anything which required expedition, if there were anything which required speed, it was within his constitutional power to have called Congress together, and, as the President himself remarks in a portion of his message where he gives a courteous notification on a particular subject to the members of Congress, it would not have been attended with any increase of the public expenditures, because, under the happy authority of the new compensation bill, the members who were called to meet in extraordinary session would themselves have to defray the expenses of that assemblage.

Mr. TAPPAN. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to get the floor on this bill on Friday last to say a few words chiefly on the point which has been so ably presented by the gentleman from Louisiana. The great objection I have to the bill under consideration is, that by voting for it we are called upon to indorse an executive war, a war in which the nation has been plunged without the cooperation of the legal war-making power, and the end of which no man can tell. That is my great objection to this bill. We are called upon to vote for a deficiency bill covering some ten million dollars, eight million of which is for expenditures in relation to the service of the Army. This is not the regular appropriation, but for expenses accruing since the last regular appropriation for the Army was made, and in addition to it. The sum asked for to cover this deficiency, is within two or three million of the whole amount expended in 1812, the first year of the war with Great Britain, for army expenses.

Sir, the actual expenditures for the Army service for the fiscal year ending last June, in a time of profound peace, were as much, within about one million dollars, as in the most expensive year of our last war with Great Britain. I think that the people of this country have just cause to be alarmed at the rapidity with which the expenses of this Government are increasing. No administration of any party in this country, except this Democratic party, could stand three months under such an increase of expenditures as have been rolled up under the last and the present Administrations.

But I wish to say one word in reference to the character of this deficiency bill. I have not examined the particular provision for the payment of the officers of this House, nor do I care to. I presume that the committee have taken the means to secure all the information that is to be had, and have acted fairly in regard to that matter. I am not so anxious to save at the spigot when the entire contents of the barrel are running out at the bung-hole. What are some of these deficiencies? A few moments ago I looked over the statement sent in here, based on contracts made for the transportation of the army from Kansas to Utah, and I found, as it seems to me, very extraordinary features in those contracts. Russell, Waddell & Co., for transportation of stores from Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to Utah, are paid $1 35 to $4 50 per hundred pounds for each hundred miles; for all over ten million pounds they are paid an increase of twenty-five per cent.; and for all over fifteen million pounds, the pay is advanced thirty-five per cent.; and so the pay goes on increasing as the quantity to be transported increases. Then there is another feature of demurrage. The Government contracts to pay these contractors five dollars for each wagon, for every day their wagons may be delayed on the route.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry? Does he think it unreasonable to pay five dollars a day for a team, teamster, wagon, and six yoke of oxen?

Mr. TAPPAN. I only refer to this—

Mr. PHELPS. I ask him what would be the wages of such a wagon and team in his own State?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is not in order. The gentleman from New Hampshire declines to yield the floor.

Mr. TAPPAN. I was only about to say that this contract provides for delays, and that five dollars shall be allowed for every day for every single wagon. I do not know whether if the delays were not improper, that that would be too large an amount. But what guarantee has the Government that the trains may not be delayed for the mere purpose of recovering a large amount by way of "demurrage?" I do not think, under such a provision, that these contractors will be particularly anxious to proceed very rapidly with their trains—

Mr. PHELPS. Permit me to explain that. It is for the purpose of compensating the contractors if they are delayed by the officers of the Government.

Mr. TAPPAN. I must decline to yield. I think that this Government will find a very pretty little bill by the time all these stores are transported to Utah, for demurrages under this sort of contract.

But another extraordinary feature of it is, as I have said, that as the quantity to be transported is increased, the pay for transportation is increased in the same proportion. I think this is a very extraordinary feature. The more stores we have to transport, the higher the rate of compensation which is given to the contractors for doing the work. Now, the principle usually acted on in cases of this sort is just the reverse of this. The larger the quantity of freight to be transported, the less it would seem, could it be afforded to do the work for. In any case, the rate of remuneration should not be augmented with the increase of the employment furnished.

But, sir, something has been said here in reference to the cost of transporting a barrel of flour from Fort Leavenworth to Utah. I have gone into a little estimate, for the purpose of seeing how much it will probably cost under this contract. I understand that the distance agreed upon from Fort Leavenworth to Utah is two thousand one hundred miles, which, at $1 35 per hundred pounds, (the lowest amount paid) for each hundred miles, supposing a barrel of flour to weigh two hundred pounds, would give a cost of $56 70 for the transportation of a barrel of flour from Fort Leavenworth to Utah. Then, sir, the United States Government are bound to furnish an escort for the trains; and by the time you pay your demurrage, and for the escort, it will cost over $100 for every barrel of flour that goes to Utah. At this rate our Mormon war will be a rather expensive luxury before it is over.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. TAPPAN. I am just through; and the gentleman can then make any explanation. Now, sir, as I said, without knowing precisely when or where this war is to end, or what it was commenced for, or, in fact, what the troops are to do after they get there, we are called upon, by the passage of this bill, to indorse this executive usurpation. If we do it now; we may do it again, and I am opposed to setting any precedent of the kind. And let me say, Mr. Chairman, at the rate the expenditures for this Utah war are going on, in a year from to-day it will have cost more than the war with Great Britain and the Mexican war together, and, as a friend near me remarks, for aught I know, the war of the Revolution thrown in.

Now, sir, I am not for going forward any further in the dark. I am not for indorsing this action of the Executive, when, as has been well said by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] if there had been an extraordinary exigency requiring this large expenditure of money, and involving the country in a war which it may take years to get extricated from, the Congress of the United States, which is the war-making power, should have been called together. But there was no such pressing exigency. The President might well have waited until the regular session of Congress before involving the country in a war which may require the expenditure of untold millions. Although I might be disposed to vote for some of the items in this bill, and may do so in some other shape, yet I will not, and I hope our friends upon this side of the House will not, indorse this executive war, by voting for this measure.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PHELPS. Oh, I hope not. There may be other gentlemen who desire to speak; and this is the last day for debate.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I insist on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the five minutes' debate will afford gentlemen an opportunity to be further heard upon this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOGOC reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

WASHINGTON POLICE.

Mr. LEITER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a substitute for the bill reported yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] from the Committee for the District of Columbia, in regard to a police force for this city. I ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed, to be considered whenever that bill comes up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gives notice that he will offer a substitute, and asks that it be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEITER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

No objection was made; and it was ordered accordingly.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOPKINS, (at twenty-seven minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

No. 243) for the relief of the heirs of Captain Alexander Rose. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred additional papers relating to claims to lands in the Munsee reservation in Kansas, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Secretary of the Interior; which was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 165) authorizing the construction of a dry-dock for the naval service, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Jewett, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 245) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Luther Jewett, late collector of the district of Portland and Falmouth, in the State of Maine. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States two additional regiments of volunteers; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KENNEDY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the benefit of the nearest male heir of the late Major General Towson, United States Army, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BIGLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of Henry G. Carson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GREEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 246) to provide for the geological and mineralogical survey of the Territory of New Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

OBITUARY ADDRESSES.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the resolution which I submitted yesterday, as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Printing, in regard to printing the obituary addresses on the death of certain members.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, in pamphlet form, for the use of the Senate, ten thousand copies of the addresses made by the members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives, upon the occasions of the death of the Hon. A. P. Butler, of South Carolina, Hon. James Bell, of New Hampshire, and Hon. Thomas J. Rusk, of Texas, late Senators of the United States; and that the Printer to the Senate be directed to prepare them in a similar manner to the eulogies on the life of Hon. John M. Clayton.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call the attention of the Senate to this resolution, which is introduced by the Senator from Texas as a substitute for the adverse report on the same subject made by the Committee on Printing. The committee were satisfied that, unless the practice indicated by the resolution were arrested, it would be carried into effect in every instance where a death may hereafter occur in the Senate. The committee do not believe that it is the sense of the Senate that this should be done. It has been done heretofore in only a few instances, on the deaths of very extraordinarily eminent men. The committee do not dispute that those whose names it is now sought to commemorate in this manner were eminent men. The relations borne to them by the members of the committee preclude the possibility of any one coming to the conclusion that it is from any disrespect to them or their memory that an adverse report has been made by the Committee on Printing upon the proposition to print the addresses and eulogiums delivered upon the occasions of the enunciation of their deaths here.

The estimated cost of this printing, I will now state, and I shall allude to that no further, is upwards of two thousand dollars. The committee do not believe that it is necessary to the fame of these gentlemen that this expense should be incurred for the purpose of publishing a book. The committee know and feel sensibly the very great difficulty, as well as the very great delicacy, that exists in any effort which is made to abridge the honors that shall hereafter be paid, or that shall now be paid, to deceased members of this body; but they believe that a proper respect for the opinions which have been manifested throughout the Senate in regard to the practices connected with public printing, deemed to be vicious in many respects, requires them to report against a project which involves an expense to the public Treasury without any corresponding benefit.

The committee have another reason for insisting upon retrenchment in these matters upon the present occasion. This resolution embraces the names of three of our deceased members. All of us feel the highest respect for the memory of each of those gentlemen, and many the most ardent affection. Such being the case, we can arrest this practice now without any charge of being invidious. If we wait to do it hereafter, until an occasion when but a single member shall have left us, it will be pronounced invidious, the attempt will not succeed, and the practice will become established. That is the belief of the committee. Holding that it is no disrespect to the memory of these gentlemen whatever, and that the public service and its economy ought to be preserved by all respectful and proper action in this body, the Committee on Printing have instructed me to report adversely, and to make this statement of facts in behalf of the action they have taken. I hope the resolution of the Senator from Texas, as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Printing, will not be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. STUART. I should like to have that substitute read.

The Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOUSTON.

Mr. STUART. Is that a substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an independent resolution. The Senator from Texas said he designed it as a substitute for the report of the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, no remarks which I may offer to the Senate on this occasion can possibly be construed into any disrespect for the Committee on Printing, or the judgment which they have formed upon this subject. I congratulate the country upon the spirit of economy and retrenchment that is manifested by the report in this case; but it reminds me of a farmer who determined to be very economical. His pigeons were sometimes troublesome, and they were in the habit of going into the gable end of his barn, and there destroying some of his grain. He concluded that he would stop that waste. He closed the gable end, but forgot to shut the door, and all the smaller animals and barn yard-fowl got in. So this is really beginning to retrench upon this little item when we find that there is great waste generally throughout the expenditures of Congress. We are to set an example by retrenching this mere trifle of expense.

I have no disposition to enlarge the sphere of expenditure and extravagance; but I consider this a matter that concerns the feelings and the reputation of the Senate. Three gentlemen of our companions here have lately left this body; they were all respectable; they were not undistinguished, any one of them. It has been the practice heretofore to publish the obituary addresses delivered on the occasion of the death of gentlemen who have died while members of this body. When there has been such a manifest calamity visiting this body as the death of three distinguished members of it in one year, I do not see that we should begin retrenchment here. Retrenchments ought, in my opinion, to be prospective and not retroactive in their effect. If it is thought proper or wise by the Senate to stop this practice, let them make a rule from henceforth forbidding it, and let it be understood; and then no disrespect can be offered to any one, as it can point to no one in particular. In this case, I think it would be a reflection on the memory of these three gentlemen, for the Senate, at this particular time, to adopt a measure of retrenchment which would be retroactive in its action in relation to them. The expense is a mere trifle, and will not exceed, I am assured, two thousand dollars.

These gentlemen have friends and acquaintances throughout the United States who are anxious to know what their position was here, the particulars of their history, their birth, their origin, their progress in life, and what were the sentiments of their associates in this body in relation to them. I will not pretend to say how many applications have been made to me for these obituaries, for they are numberless. I think the Senate will be but discharging a duty which it owes, and it will be a proper respect for the memory of the deceased, to publish these obituaries. I consider the expense to be comparatively nothing. If the committee recommend the adoption of a measure of reform, hereafter to be brought into practice by the Senate, it is well; but let it not go back to affect the memory of our lately deceased colleagues. I should consider it a direct reflection on their memory and the feelings of their friends if we were now to depart from the custom that has prevailed in this body heretofore.

I am not disposed to take up the time of the Senate. I will simply say in conclusion, that I think it is due to the memory of these gentlemen that these obituaries should be properly prepared for distribution, as thousands and thousands are writing here, requesting that they may be furnished with them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I feel it incumbent on me to say a word or two in reference to this matter, for the simple reason that, as perhaps you may recollect, sir, I originated the opposition to the publication of obituaries during the last Congress when I was a member of the Committee on Printing. I did so, because I thought it entirely unnecessary, and not of the slightest consequence to the memory of the deceased Senators. I made the objection in a very eminent case, that of the late Mr. Clayton. It has not been a common thing, as supposed by the Senator from Texas, to publish these obituary notices. It has only been done heretofore in a very few cases, and those of very distinguished gentlemen. The obituaries delivered on the deaths of Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. King, the Vice President, I think, were the only ones that have been published. Many Senators have died during their period of service, and obituary addresses have been delivered here in this Chamber, and no further notice was taken by way of publication. When the case of Mr. Clayton came up, although he was a very distinguished man, I thought it as well to interpose then, and to object to the further publication of books of this description. The committee reported accordingly. We reported against it; but at a later period of the session, the pressure being very strong, the Senate reversed the action of the committee, and agreed to publish those obituaries, but not to have them bound in the original form. The reason assigned was, that Mr. Clayton had occupied such distinguished stations in the Government, that it was not a proper place exactly to interpose an objection to the publication which was so much desired.

Now, sir, here are three Senators who died in the recess of the last Congress in different sections of the country, one from the North, one from the South, and one from the extreme Southwest, all of whom were very respectable gentlemen, and men of eminence; but I think the reputation of men is not aided at all by publishing obituary notices of them. I think the great object which is attained by that, is rather extending the reputation of the living members who have made the speeches, by sending forth their ideas as expressed here, and probably with care, and in a style and form that they consider to be very fine, and distributing them all over the country. It adds nothing to the reputation of the men themselves, and I think it is a waste of money. The sum is not large, to be sure, but still it is a waste of money to publish these obituary notices so extensively in the shape of books, and distribute them at the expense of the public Treasury, when no object in the world is attained except to send these little speeches abroad in the land for people to read and get the names of those who are left, and who make the speeches, for that is just about all it comes to.

The sum, to be sure, is small, but I have had occasion to say in this place before, that if we hesitate about making a saving because it is a small saving, we shall hesitate quite as much and as often upon great ones. I should be very glad to strike at many of the abuses in the way of expenditure. I should like very much to strike at post office contracts, and Army contracts, and other great things which, if we could get hold of them, and there was a disposition to carry out a real reform, would afford us an opportunity to effect much; but the fact that we cannot do that, or will not do that, is no excuse for expending what is called a small sum, only two or three thousand dollars, every time any particular individuals may want to receive at our hands a book of this description.

I took part in one of these cases, and made a speech myself on the occasion. I thought it was due to the memory of a gentleman whom I respected very highly and loved very much; but I have no particular desire that it shall go abroad into all the States of the Union to be read, and I do not think the reputation of my friend will be a particle increased, or his memory benefited by it. Sir, we have a great many debts to pay. There are a good many people to whom this Government owes small sums, and it is obliged to borrow money to pay them. There are a good many people who have little pension bills, and little claim bills here, who are waiting for their money, and need it. If we devote our spare cash to that purpose in the first place, we should be doing quite as well as in publishing these books; and if we refuse to grant this request, in this particular instance; if we stop here, as suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Printing; I see in it no disrespect to the memory of these gentlemen, whom we all respected so much. Therefore, I hope the Senate will follow out the suggestion of the Committee on Printing, and begin just here, and say that we will leave the reputation of those gentlemen who are so unfortunate as to die in their country's service, in this Chamber, to be taken care of by what that reputation may happen to deserve, and by the memory of men in the country, in reference to their public service. At all events, I beg leave to repeat again, that I think we accomplish nothing by publishing these books except extending the knowledge of those who are left in the Senate to speak of those who are gone.

Mr. BROWN. If this is to be a genuine attempt to reform abuses in the matter of public printing, I shall vote with the committee, distasteful as it is to me to vote against such a proposition as this. I think, myself, it looks a good deal like straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, to commence a reform upon a little proposition of this sort. Still, if we are going to adhere to it, and stop this innoxious abuse of publishing every thing at the public expense, and making pictures of everything, I will stand by the committee, and incur my portion of the odium of refusing to do a graceful and, as I think, a proper thing towards deceased members of this body. Under ordinary circumstances, if the matter of public printing had not run into a most wonderful abuse, I should not hesitate to overrule a decision of the committee; but, perhaps, if we are going to reform, we might as well commence here as anywhere, and commence with deceased members of this body. All of us know that the great expense of publishing these obituaries will be in preparing plates of the deceased members. That costs a great deal more than putting up the type, buying the paper, and everything else. But, sir, we make pictures of everything, and I sent just now to get the last report that has come in. Here is a specimen of it.

Mr. HALE. What is it?

Mr. BROWN. Emory's report upon the boundary between the United States and Mexico. I happened on it this morning, and the first thing that struck me was a painted Indian, mounted on horseback. What that has to do with the boundary, or with surveying the boundary, or giving you any intelligence of it, would puzzle the wisest man in the world to tell; and yet nobody can say what it costs. Here is a magnificent picture of an Indian, and the book is full of them. Then, again, there are fifty or sixty pages at the end—yes, perhaps one hundred—covered with pictures of shells, and bugs, and so on, all the way through. This is the first volume, and I understand, incidentally, that it is to be followed by four or five more of the same size. Why, sir, the books will cost you as much as one of the regiments that fought the battles of Mexico. It will cost you more than the whole survey—and all for what? For these miserable pictures, which never ought to have gone into the books. They are out of place, out of character, an outrage upon the public Treasury and the public confidence. Why, sir, we have hardly got through paying Schoolcraft for an Indian book. Now you cannot send out a man to survey a railroad across the mountains, or survey the boundary between two countries, that he does not come back here with one of these picture-books, filled full of Indians, snakes, bugs, shells, and all manner of things. This ought to be put a stop to. Do you know how many of that kind of books are being published now? First, you have the great explorer, Captain Wilkes. He is making books. I do not know whether we have got through with the Japan Expedition or not. I do not think we have. That was multiplied to several volumes.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Mississippi allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. It is for the purpose of asking him to be quite accurate in the advertisement he is giving, through his speech, to the people everywhere in the United States, about the number and character of the books we are printing, because the effect of such expositions of the attractions of these volumes upon the public appetite for them is seen in a multiplied increase of demands upon us all to send them. I generally get about fifty or sixty copies of one of these works, and I am very sure that before the echoes produced by their publication and advertisement here have died away, I have to answer some four or five hundred demands for them. Of course I am obliged to say to four fifths of the applicants that my supply being a very small amount for an extraordinarily large constituency, is exhausted. I am losing ground with my correspondents. I am now excusing myself for not circulating the Japan Expedition, my supply of which was exhausted by the circulation of the first volume two years ago. It is the same case with several others of these attractive works. If the honorable Senator, in tenderness of us all, will take care not to excite expectations by his speech, which we cannot fulfill, he will save us from a world of trouble.

Mr. BROWN. It is the first time I have ever known that it has been any disadvantage to the Senator from New York. I think I shall go for these books hereafter. [Laughter.] I shall have to change my policy, because it is going to injure him in public estimation. I am so well satisfied that he ought to be injured, that I am not sure that it would not be a good speculation to publish the books. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. HALE, and others. Let us finish this.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the special order be postponed, so that we may terminate this matter.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senate will take a vote, as the morning hour has expired, I do not care to detain the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say a word, as a member of the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If debate is to go on, I feel under obligation to call for the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order supersedes the resolution under consideration, unless the Senate otherwise order.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the special order, so that we may finish this resolution. If we do not do so, we shall make no progress with this subject.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the special order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Minnesota bill. The motion is to postpone that, and continue the further consideration of this resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. As a member of the Committee on Printing, I feel desirous that its report should be sustained. No one can entertain a higher respect for the memory of the deceased Senators, no man thought more highly of them, while living, than I did. Every member of the committee entertains the same opinions of them; but all admit that great abuses have crept into the system of printing. The committee are the proper agents of the Senate, and if they are expected to reform these crying abuses, they must be sustained by the Senate. The Senator from Texas says this is a small matter. It is so. It is with small matters reforms must commence. These small items have increased to an aggregate of millions yearly. Here is a proper place for beginning; and if the Senate will sustain the committee, they believe that by the end of the session they can show such a reformation as will gratify every gentleman here, and greatly relieve the Treasury. The sum already saved is very large, and the committee will see that no more "picture-books" will be printed by their recommendation. The only work begun, and not completed, is the Mexican Boundary Survey. The first volume has cost over one hundred thousand dollars, and it may reach one hundred and fifty thousand more; for no man can tell, before it is ended, what those pictures, of which the Senator from Mississippi so justly complains, will cost. It is this rage for unnecessary embellishment which has so greatly increased the cost of the public printing. As an evidence of this, one item occurs to my mind. A single dish of strawberries in the last Patent Office report, cost, for engraving and printing, over two thousand dollars. This is a question of business, of economy, if you like, and its decision, then, should be without reference to the merits of the distinguished dead. Their fame does not need it.

Mr. PUGH. Has the resolution been before the committee?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir; and they have reported against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a resolution presented by the Senator from Texas, as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. There is not, certainly a man in the Senate who would be less suspected of any prejudice against this proposition than myself, for one of these gentlemen was a deceased colleague of mine, with whom I lived upon the most intimate terms of friendship for thirty years; but I have long thought that we were going wrong in this direction, and that obituaries of this kind ought not to be printed. I concur with the suggestions so well made by the chairman of the Committee on Printing. I think if we are ever going to begin a reform, this is the place. We may begin it here without any invidious distinctions. During the last recess, three members of this body, from different sections of the country, were called away; one of them was my own colleague, from the State of New Hampshire. But, sir, the thing has been going on, constantly increasing, and if you do not stop here, it will never stop. It has not always been confined to members of the Senate. I think the Senate went so far in the case of Mr. Webster as to have eulogies delivered here, and printed at the expense of the Senate, on the occasion of his death, though he had long before ceased to be a member of the body.

I have long thought we were running into foolish and extravagant expenses, not only in this respect, but in the matter of funerals. I thought when Mr. Adams died there was a very useless and unnecessary parade at the public expense. When Mr. Calhoun died it was repeated; but I did not want to object then. When the House of Representatives had been guilty of that folly in reference to one northern man, and the Senate in reference to one southern man, I hoped we should be done with the folly of sending committees of Congress all the way from Washington to the places where the dead members were to be buried. But another instance came up of a very eminent and distinguished man, and although I had determined to interpose objections, and notified his colleague that I would do so, yet, on further reflection, I felt unequal to the task. That was the case of Mr. Clay. We sent a committee to Kentucky to attend to his funeral. This thing has been increasing, and will increase; and if you do not stop it now, you will never stop it. Now we can stop with the greatest advantage to ourselves and to the country, and we can stop without offending anybody.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall feel that the action of the Senate is retroactive and disrespectful to the memory of these gentlemen if it refuses now to follow the usual course. If it is to be prospective in its action it can very readily intimate that now, and it will be understood, and then if an instance should occur hereafter, this printing will not be expected. If gentlemen intend to retrench at this point, they should go further in order to make the retrenchment perfect. Every column that is published of the proceedings of Congress costs seven dollars and a half. That expense has already been incurred in this case; and what is now proposed is but a trifling addition to that. In order to perfect the system of economy it will be proper not to make the announcement of the death of a member at all. I cannot see why it is that it is necessary to begin here with the proposed retrenchment when it is retroactive in its influence upon the body, and upon the world. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] who opposes my proposition, had an agency in inaugurating this system, as he says, in reference to Mr. Clayton. I admit his distinction; I admit his worth; I admit the eminent services that he had rendered to the country; but is that to be the rule of action? Are exceptions to be made among those members who have departed, upon a supposed distinction between them in point of eminence? The Senator from Maine intimates that benefits are to flow from such publications to those who delivered the eulogies. If that is supposed to be the case, I shall move that the remarks I made on the death of my late colleague be excepted, for I did not think them either worthy of the occasion, or creditable to myself, being unprepared. I felt a delicacy in moving in this matter, because of my participation. I was importuned again and again to bring forward some measure to secure this publication. I was solicited to do so by my constituents, who desired to see what had been said on the occasion of the enunciation of the death of their distinguished Senator. From Maine, from New York, from every portion of the country, I have received application for these obituaries. I have brought forward the proposition from a sense of duty, not for the purpose of rendering my name conspicuous, or showing what fine things I had said, not in order to gain éclat from the world. I had no disposition to seek notoriety without fame, nor did I care much about that. What I said was impromptu, and without preparation. I shall move to amend my resolution by excepting from the publication the remarks which I made in announcing the death of my late distinguished colleague, that I may disabuse the Senator's mind of the idea that I had any object of a sinister character.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I beg the Senator to understand me. I meant no sort of imputation upon the motives of the Senator from Texas, or anybody else. What I said was, that the effect of these publications was to give notoriety to those who made the addresses on the occasion, rather than to add to the reputation of those who were spoken of. I did not suggest the motive, nor did I intimate, that there was any motive other than a proper one in the mind of the mover or any one else.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not misapprehend the Senator at all. His remark was a general one, and had no reference to me; but I should be perfectly willing to be excluded from the possible benefits which it is supposed may result from this publication to those who participated in these obituaries. I am willing to exclude my remarks altogether, as I did not think they were worthy of the occasion, or creditable to myself, being entirely unprepared.

If we are to begin on this occasion, it is a most extraordinary evidence of retrenchment. Let it be hereafter understood, if you please, that no more notices of this kind are to be needed, and let no more announcements be made of the death of Senators to this body, if you intend to effect a real retrenchment.

So far as the gentleman's remarks were in relation to Army and Navy contracts, if he will only bring forward a measure to correct those evils, he will not find a more cordial cooperation from any individual in this body than from myself. I will go with him heart and hand in correcting abuses of magnitude in the first instance; but I will not begin at minor matters, that are mere trifles in themselves, and on occasions that require a different course, in my humble estimation.

If this has been a custom of the Senate, this is not the place to begin the correction. Henceforth you may have it understood, but do not go back to the past. I do trust the Senate will say that these obituaries shall be published. What is $2,000? We waste it every day here in nothing of any consequence.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say a very few words on this subject. I think there can be no Senator who will go further to restrain the exorbitant expense in public printing than I will, and yet I cannot but be aware that to refuse all expenditure is no sort of economy. Improper, improvident, and wasteful expenditure is that which is to be checked by the exercise of economy. These books, one of which has been produced here by the Senator from Mississippi, involve, in my judgment, a proper expenditure, provided that expenditure is under proper guards. We send abroad exploring parties through the country, and necessarily so, in the discharge of the great duties to the public that devolve upon the Government, exploring for the Pacific railroad, the Mexican boundary, and explorations by officers of the Army for military purposes. They are required, and properly required, to make a journal; and when they make their report to the head of the Department, the work is done; but it would seem to me to follow, as a necessary incident to that work, that it should be published by Congress and diffused; and yet I do not know where the proper restraint is, as I am not at all conversant with the details; whether it is in the Committee on Public Printing, or whether it rests with the Executive Departments, but it should rest somewhere to check this truly unnecessary expenditure in embellishing these books. Take the painted Indians, the scenes, the landscapes that are given in them, or the matters of scientific discovery in philosophy which are exhibited, and they seem to me to be entirely out of place; and I am informed, and I think correctly informed, that they make one half the expenditure of these publications, or perhaps more than that. They are utterly out of place, and derogatory to the character of the Government. To print the report alone, which would diffuse the information contained in them, I should think is not an improvident use of the public money.

Then as to this particular source of expenditures: why, sir, we know very well that it has been the usage of the Senate to pay very great honor to the memory of those who have served their country long and faithfully, and who have been called from this world while serving here. Committees have been sent home with them to very distant parts of the Confederacy. Honors have been rendered to them all the way while their remains were passing through the country, and great honors have been paid to them and to their memories when they arrived at their homes. For what? Not only as a grateful acknowledgment for their public services, but with a view to impress, I think, upon the rising generation, the character, the services, and the merits of those men. It has been customary, also, to pay tributes to their memories upon this floor, and upon the floor of the other House. That is a usage with which I am satisfied no Senator will be disposed in the slightest degree to interfere—a very proper usage. And then I should think it would follow as an incident, that we should, in a plain way, without ostentation or expense, diffuse those tributes after they are thus given. Therefore, with every desire in the world to unite with the honorable Senator who is at the head of the Printing Committee to check improvident expenditure, I cannot agree to this report.

Sir, if there be no means of checking improvident expenditure but by denying all expenditures, we shall have come to a very unfortunate pass in the country. I confess, with the very great respect I bear to the eminent and distinguished gentleman who conducted the Mexican boundary survey, it was with concern and regret that I saw that his book also was the subject of unnecessary and improvident embellishment. I can see no reason for it, no propriety in it. I think it is derogatory to the character of the Government that it should send abroad books that are really interesting for their matter, and for the information they contain, with all these embellishments that are worthy only of the humblest picture shops.

That is an improvident expenditure; but to print the books and to diffuse them, I should not consider extravagant. These are my views; and so feeling, with every regret not to have it in my power to follow the honorable chairman, I shall feel required to vote for printing these eulogies.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The resolution of the Senator from Texas was offered as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Printing, which is now up for consideration. The Clerk does not seem to understand its position. If it were offered now as an independent resolution, it would necessarily be referred to the Committee on Printing, which has already reported on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator from Arkansas, that the Senator from Texas submitted his resolution, and said he designed to offer it as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Printing. The Chair intended to state to the Senator from Texas, when the discussion was through, that the only mode by which he could accomplish his object, would be to move to proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing, and when that was up, offer this as a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope that will be regarded by unanimous consent as having been done, so that we may have a vote on the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Texas, that his only mode of accomplishing what is desired by him, is to move to take up for consideration the report of the Committee on Printing on the same subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose that may be considered as up by the consent of the Senate; but I make that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish now to make no reply to anything that has been said in regard to this matter. The action of the committee is understood by the Senate, and I trust we shall have the vote.

Mr. BIGGS. I understand the motion of the Senator from Texas, is to proceed now to the consideration of the report of the committee; and then, after proceeding to the consideration of the report, he will move his substitute. It is now up, I understand, by the decision of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and there were calls for a division.

Mr. STUART. Is the division called for upon the motion to take up the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question pending.

Mr. KING. No division is required on that.

Mr. STUART. There is no objection to the report coming up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the report will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move this resolution as a substitute for the report.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I understand the Senator from Texas to move to exclude his own remarks from the publication?

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an adverse report from the Committee on Printing, against the publication of these eulogies. The Senator from Texas now moves this resolution as a substitute for the adverse report.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I understand him to move to exclude from the book that is to be published, his own speech. I will say that I would as soon think of publishing Hamlet with the part of Hamlet omitted, as to publish the book with the remarks of the Senator from Texas omitted. If that motion should prevail, I should certainly feel bound to vote against the proposition unless each Senator whose speech was to be published declined to have his speech published also. Then I think the proposition would be entirely harmless.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator from Texas has not made that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has moved no amendment of that kind. The question is on the resolution offered by him as a substitute for the report.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to explain very briefly the reasons for my vote, as I do not wish to be misunderstood. I shall vote for the resolution of the Senator from Texas for the publication of these obituary notices, but not on the ground that I myself participated in a portion of the proceedings to be thus solemnly published. It is not necessary for any use or purpose of mine that the remarks which I made on those occasions should be now published in this way. Congress provides for the publication in an authentic form of every word which is ever uttered here. That is ordinarily a sufficient publication of anything that I have occasion to submit to the Senate. On other occasions of peculiar interest or importance, all the world knows that it is the custom of Senators to print at their own expense extra copies of their speeches or remarks; and what others have done, I myself have done on other occasions, so far as to give wider circulation to the remarks which I felt it my privilege and duty to make in honor of the distinguished Senators whose deaths have resulted in these proceedings, than the Senate will give to the same remarks if they adopt this resolution.

I therefore stand in this matter free from any cause for questioning the vote I shall give. When I came into the Senate several years ago, I found that it was the custom of the Senate to pay funeral honors to the memories of members who died in the performance of their public duties. That custom was dictated by feelings that are inherent in our common nature. Publications of these honors had been received and accepted by the country with satisfaction. The satisfaction which the people have manifested with those proceedings seems to me to harmonize with nature and with the constitution of a republican people, watchful of the conduct of their public servants, and appreciative and grateful when they discharged their duties with fidelity and advantage to the country. That custom has continued practically unbroken. Many instances have occurred here on which honors have been paid to distinguished men, which, examined from the position in which they stood, seemed to me exaggerated. Still they were paid by common consent; and he would have been justly thought uncharitable who would interpose to detract, in any one case, from the tributes which were thus paid to the memories of statesmen thus honored.

Now, it was only at the last session that senatorial honors were paid to a statesman of whom I had been a friend and follower, John M. Clayton, of Delaware. I felt that those honors were justly due to him, and I was grateful when the Senate accorded them. The publication of the tributes paid to his memory was a part of those honors. Now, there have recently occurred three deaths instead of one—the deaths of three eminent men—I think men who have filled, in a very high degree, the full complement of senatorial character. It is proposed to withhold a part of these honors from them. Two of them were Senators from whom I was politically divided and widely separated. I concur in what the honorable Senator from Texas says in regard to the case of the late Senator from that State, Mr. Rusk. An abridgement of the honors paid to his memory will be felt to be a discrimination insidious and unkind. As it is in the case of that State, so it is with the States of the other deceased Senators. I therefore shall vote for the resolution of the honorable Senator from Texas. I shall very gladly cooperate generally in any measures for a retrenchment of the expenses of the Government. But I do not think that Senators are removed from this field by death so often, and in such numbers, that the retrenchment which may be made by discontinuing these honors, will be important.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I feel unwilling to be placed in any degree in a false position about this matter, although my position about anything is of very little consequence to the country, or to anybody but myself. I do not think this is an occasion, it being a mere matter of business, a matter of printing, and these gentlemen having been deceased for some time, upon which we can get up feeling or sympathy by any particular gravity of voice or peculiarity of manner; nor do I see that there is any necessity for any particular tears. It is a mere common matter of business; we are to decide whether we are called upon by any necessity of the case, from regard or respect to the memory of these gentlemen, for all of whom I had very high respect and regard, to publish this book.

I agree with the Senator from New York, that funeral honors paid to men who die here in the discharge of their duty, are very proper. I should agree, moreover, that the more simple they are, the more honor we render, and the better we do our duty. I think that the whole matter is better illustrated by an example which I saw stated in the newspapers a few days ago, of a former member of Congress who, when he died here, appropriated beforehand and put in the hands of a friend a sum of money to pay the expenses of his funeral, and left it as a particular request that those expenses should not be paid out of the public Treasury. I think that he showed more regard for what is truly and justly befitting such an occasion, than we show by making this extraordinary display.

However, sir, I do not wish to be understood as objecting in any manner to all the proper funeral honors being paid to the memory of any man who dies here in the discharge of his duty. This is not a question that refers to that at all. It is a mere matter of publishing a little book, with a little cover, with a little picture on the outside of it, to be sent abroad for the gratification of the particular persons who receive it, and not to add in any way to the honors that are paid to the memory of our deceased associates. It has not been a general custom, as stated by the honorable Senator from New York. The first time when such a thing was done within my recollection was in the case of Mr. Calhoun; and the same thing was done upon the death of Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, and Vice President King. Those are the only cases where this has been done, except upon the death of Mr. Clayton. Three Senators from New Hampshire have died within a few years. Mr. Atherton died while he was a member of the Senate; but no such honor was paid to him; no book was published. Mr. Norris died here since I have been a member of the Senate; but no book was published on that occasion; and no book has been published, except in the case of a very few exceedingly distinguished men, one of whom was the Vice President of the United States. It is, in fact, inaugurating a new policy to say and to decree here that whenever a member of this body happens to die, in Washington or out of Washington, while he is a member of the Senate, not only the ordinary notice must be taken of it, but we must publish all that gentlemen here choose to say on the occasion for distribution.

If I thought that by objecting to this proposition I was detracting one jot or one tittle from the proper honors to be paid to my deceased friend, I should not have said a word in opposition to it. I am unwilling that the idea should be considered a just one, and one which is to prevail in the Senate of the United States, that because an expense is a small one, therefore it is of no consequence. As I said before, if we cannot begin to reform with an ordinary matter which is unnecessary, we can never do anything with an extraordinary matter which is unnecessary. It is not the amount that I care about; but I feel disposed to aid the Committee on Printing, as far as I can, in all their honest efforts to prevent this unnecessary expenditure of money. That is all there is of it. I think that nobody's reputation will be advanced, nobody's memory will be honored, nothing will be done except simply affording a little extra sum of money to the printers and bookbinders, and then we shall have the extraordinary privilege of sending what we said on the occasion to different parts of the country for people to read; and the conclusion will be come to by all sensible people that every man who dies here as a Senator, whatever he might be at home, or whatever he might have been while living, is an extraordinary man the very moment he dies, and that they are all pretty much of the same size. The amount of it is, that the whole thing is, in the manner in which it is done, calculated to mislead the public and to produce no good effect; and I am just as willing to interpose here as anywhere else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Texas, as a substitute for the report.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bright, Broderick, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the adverse report of the committee be now concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BRIGHT. Yesterday, I moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill admitting Kansas as a State. I suppose it was generally understood in the Senate that my object in making that motion was to relieve the Senate, and particularly the Chair, from the embarrassment that would result from deciding several questions of order that were raised. It was not my intention to insist upon the motion; and now, with the leave of the Senate, I will withdraw it. That will leave the question where I understand the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Illinois desired it to be left.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate grant leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider?

Mr. HALE. Does not that require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A majority can grant leave, I think.

Mr. BRIGHT. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. If it did not require unanimous consent, you would defeat the right of the minority to insist on the motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. There is no doubt it requires unanimous consent. Any Senator can object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I only want to know whether I have the right.

The motion to reconsider was withdrawn.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I was not aware that this bill was so near being brought to a conclusion this morning. I do not propose to detain the Senate a great while, but simply to recapitulate the views which I have expressed in this body heretofore, particularly in the debate that took place some two years ago, I think, on the passage of the enabling act authorizing the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a State constitution. There was considerable discussion at that time as to whether one provision contained in that bill, proposing to allow aliens not naturalized to vote for delegates to the convention which was to form the organic law of Minnesota, was in accordance with the Constitution of the United States. I contended then that it was of very little consequence whether a principle of that kind was recognized in an enabling act, or not, but that the question would become much more important if it should be conceded that Minnesota after becoming a State would be authorized to admit aliens not naturalized to vote in Federal elections, and I believe there is no discrimination made in the provisions of this constitution as to the elections at which aliens may be allowed to vote.

I hold now, as I did upon that occasion, that such a practice is in violation of the Constitution of the United States; not only the spirit of it, but, in fact, in some sense, of the very letter. The Constitution, for wise and sufficient reasons, conferred upon Congress the power of providing naturalization laws. The object was, to confer power upon Congress to establish some uniform rule by which to determine who were citizens of the United States when a question should arise between foreigners and natives. The object was, to prevent the evils and confusion which would be likely to result if every State were permitted to adopt a rule of her own upon that subject; some admitting foreigners to citizenship as soon as they arrived, and became domiciled in the State; others requiring one year's residence, or two years' residence, or three years, or fifteen or twenty years, or any term they might think proper; and some denying them altogether. It was in order to prevent the difficulties and confusion that might arise under such circumstances, that the Constitution of the United States conferred upon Congress the power to prescribe some uniform mode by which foreigners should be admitted to the rights of citizenship. It seems to me that there was great wisdom in that, particularly when you come to consider another clause of the Constitution which provides that the citizens of each State shall have all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. Now, how is it possible that questions which might arise under that provision of the Constitution, in the several States, can be settled or adjudicated upon any clear and satisfactory principle, if you allow each State to fix the rule by which to admit foreigners, or anybody it pleases, to citizenship?

I did not mean to go into this subject in detail, but simply to throw out a few hints to show the embarrassments that might result from admitting this power in the States. Upon the occasion to which I have alluded, it was argued that to deny this right to the States would trench upon State sovereignty in many respects. I replied, no; I said it did not touch the right of a State to fix the qualification of voters for the most numerous branch of its Legislature; it might allow women to vote, it might allow females of eighteen or fifteen years of age, or boys of twelve or fifteen, if it thought proper, to vote. We cannot help that; that is all within the power of the States. The Constitution of the United States does not interpose in regard to that. But if you were present, sir, [Mr. Biggs in the chair,] on that occasion—and I think you were—and took part in the debate, you will remember that one of the honorable Senators from Virginia said that this power of the States was so unlimited that in the South they could admit their slaves to vote, if they thought proper. I do not see any limitation at all upon the power, according to the idea on the other side, but the States may admit convicts, slaves, and foreigners; and, upon the same principle, people might come over from Canada, and vote in our elections, if the Legislatures of the border States thought proper to pass laws of such a character to permit it. As I admitted in my former argument, that would be an extreme case, but the principle extends so far that a residence of half an hour would be sufficient if a State Legislature thought proper to allow it, so that alien enemies might be brought in, and we could not prevent their voting in the Federal elections of the United States, and controlling the policy and perhaps the destiny of the whole country.

The point now is, whether this is a sufficient objection to the constitution of Minnesota; whether I ought to vote against the admission of Minnesota as a State, upon the ground that her constitution asserts the right of the State to admit aliens to vote without having been naturalized according to the laws passed by Congress under the Constitution of the United States? The Constitution of the United States is silent on such a point as that; but, in my opinion, this is a violation, a nullification of that provision of the Constitution of the United States to which I have referred. But, sir, here is the representation of the whole South, with one exception, I believe, more deeply interested in this question perhaps than any others, saying that it is important to sustain the right of the States to regulate this whole subject, insisting that to interfere with it will strike a vital blow at the sovereignty of the States.

That was the argument two years ago, and nearly the whole North united in the opinion that it was no objection. Michigan by her constitution, I believe, now exercises the power, and Congress has never interposed. No adjudication has been had on the question; and, indeed, it is difficult to see how it can arise judicially; but yet, it may arise in regard to the privileges of those who are admitted to citizenship in one State, citizens in one State being allowed by the Constitution all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. It might be a difficult question to decide on principle. Here, however, there seems to be a general concurrence in the opinion that the States ought to be allowed this power. I think there is a violation of principle in it in this respect; for if you can nullify, as I believe you plainly do by such a doctrine as this, that provision of the Constitution requiring uniformity in the admission of aliens to the rights of citizenship, you encourage, you incite, you afford a precedent for the nullification of other provisions of the Constitution. This, I think, is dangerous and mischievous.

Now, sir, what is a higher test of citizenship than the exercise of the right of suffrage? Is it not the very highest evidence that can be given by any law of a State, or the constitution of a State, that you admit a man to the right of suffrage? If you do that, is he not a citizen within that State? If a State allows an alien, after six months' residence, to exercise the right of suffrage, and thereby be a citizen of the State, is he not entitled, under the Constitution of the United States, to the privileges and immunities of citizens in other States? How would you test that question, if it should arise in any other State? Suppose an alien is admitted to the right of citizenship in Minnesota, or Michigan, and I believe the same power has been claimed in Wisconsin—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I can inform the honorable Senator that the constitution of Wisconsin contains a provision similar to that contained in the Minnesota constitution in this respect, not precisely the same, but similar, so far as persons who have declared their intention to become citizens are concerned.

Mr. BELL. The right of suffrage is the highest privilege of citizenship. We are accustomed to say that reserved sovereignty resides in the people. But who are the people? Who are these sovereigns? Are they not those who exercise their privilege through the ballot-box, which it has been contended so earnestly and strenuously, at this session, is the only medium through which citizens can express their sovereign power. Suppose an alien, who is permitted to exercise the right of suffrage in Minnesota, or Wisconsin, or Michigan, shall set up a claim to the right of American citizenship in any other State of the Union, under that provision of the Constitution which says that citizens in each State shall be entitled to all the immunities and privileges of citizens in the several States: has such a man the right to exercise all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of any State to which he may choose to migrate?

To be sure, it may be urged that there is no great difference between admitting an alien to enjoy the right of suffrage in six months, upon making a declaration of intention, and requiring him to remain five years, at the end of which time he may become a citizen, according to the laws of the United States. But, sir, I look at it as a matter of principle that aliens cannot be admitted to the rights of citizenship until the lapse of five years, unless our naturalization laws be changed; and I have often said that, in my opinion, a longer period of probation ought to be required.

I did not rise, however, for the purpose of going into the subject at large, but simply to recapitulate the grounds which I assumed in the argument two years ago, and to state that under the circumstances I should vote for the bill because of the general concession of this right both North and South, and because it is not a condition prescribed for the admission of new States by the Constitution of the United States that all the provisions of the constitution of the proposed State shall have the approval of the Senators and Representatives who act upon the question of admission, and because it would be in the power of the State, even if she should be rejected now upon the ground that she has what we consider to be an unconstitutional provision in her organic law according to the principle almost universally entertained here, after she is admitted to reform, alter, modify, or abolish her constitution at discretion, and there is no limitation of time that can prevent her doing so. It would seem, therefore, to be a very idle ceremony to reject Minnesota with her present constitution on such a ground; above all when it seems to be very generally conceded that a State has the power to regulate this subject as she pleases. I consider the principle not in this constitution alone, but in other States of the Northwest, a mischievous one. I think it leads to the encouragement of a nullification of other provisions of the Constitution of the United States more important, perhaps, than this. I regret it deeply. I deplore it. I think it is an irregularity. It is mischievous in its tendencies and results. Especially do I regret it when I consider that the whole tendency of the times and of the Government seems to me to be to disregard established principles and constitutional guarantees, and to inaugurate an anarchial, unregulated liberty.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I shall vote for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union; but I shall protest against that vote being construed into any approval, far less into any confirmation on my part so far as the vote goes, of the policy found in the constitution of this State by which foreigners are admitted to vote. I do not entertain a doubt that all that question as to who shall and who shall not administer the government of a State, which is a question of voting, is left entirely to the people of the State, to that people in whom resides the sovereignty or the supreme power. Now, the Constitution of the United States, in declaring who shall administer the Government of the United States through Representatives in the other House, and through the Executive head by means of the electoral colleges, has left it to the States to determine who they shall be within their respective limits, by prescribing that those shall vote for members of Congress, and those shall vote for electors of President and Vice President, who shall be entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of their State Legislature; thus, as I consider, in express terms leaving the power where it rightfully belongs, to the sovereignty of the respective States. I should not hold myself at liberty, therefore, to interfere in any mode whatever to check, or to restrain, or to control the power thus exercised by the States.

Mr. BELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. Then what is the use of any naturalization law passed by Congress? I should like the Senator to answer that question, and also whether, when a State does admit an alien, if she can do so, to all the privileges of a citizen of a State, that alien is not thereby entitled to all the privileges of citizens of other States to which he may go?

Mr. MASON. I will answer the Senator, so far as I am competent to do so. The Constitution of the United States devolves certain rights upon those who are called in the Constitution citizens; and therefore it may have been considered wise in those who framed the Constitution, to determine by general and uniform law who should be citizens of the United States. By a uniform law, foreigners coming within the limits of the United States, remain foreigners, unless they are made citizens by some process of law; and it may have been considered inconvenient, irregular, leading perhaps to injurious results, if, so far as the operation of the Government of the United States was concerned, it was not ascertained by a uniform law in what manner foreigners should be admitted to the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States. For this reason, as I understand, it was provided that the Congress of the United States should provide, by uniform laws of naturalization, for the admission of foreigners, to that extent, to the rights of citizens of the United States. But I do not understand that that has been taken from the individual States any power whatever already resident in those States for their own policy to declare who shall be citizens of the State. For example, the State of Virginia, or the State of Tennessee—the State of Virginia certainly has done it, but I do not know whether the State of Tennessee has—by its law has declared who shall be citizens of the State of Virginia; but it has not, in that, in the slightest degree trenching on the power that is reserved to the Federal Government to declare who shall be citizens of the United States; because, the legislation of Virginia that would constitute a foreigner a citizen of Virginia, does not thereby make him, within the meaning, as I read it, of the Constitution of the United States, a citizen who is entitled to the immunities and the rights provided for citizens of the United States by the Constitution of the United States.

Now, then, as to the constitution of Minnesota, which allows foreigners, before they become citizens of the United States, to participate in the government of Minnesota, I should not consider myself at liberty even to express an opinion; but possibly, as it has been brought into question here, it might be considered that a vote for the constitution, with that clause in it, carried some affirmation, as well as approval, by means of the Federal law, of that principle contained in the constitution of Minnesota. For myself, I disclaim it, not understanding that we possess any such power.

Nor do I mean to express any other than the most abstract opinion upon the question, as far as Minnesota is concerned; yet I cannot shut my eyes to the consequences that have already ensued in that community, and that I fear exist in other communities like situated, from admitting to all the rights of American citizens, more especially to the right of voting, foreigners who have recently come into the country, and who can now know nothing of the theory or character of our institutions. I think it is a most improvident and unfortunate act on their part. We have seen it illustrated in the case of Minnesota. What organized community of American citizens, native born, and educated in the American mode, adapted in that manner for the free institutions of our country, by understanding and appreciating their character, would have been found in the condition of this grave body that was called together to frame a constitution for Minnesota, separating the instant they met, never coalescing afterwards, constituting two separate bodies, each claiming itself to be charged with the power of framing a government, continuing separate, and dissolving as separate bodies? I say that is a phenomenon in American experience.

I remember to have seen, also, in one of those northwestern States, within the last year or two, what I believe is true, that in their ordinary Legislature, one, if not both of the Houses, remained organized, for I know not how long, under the control of two separate presiding officers, sitting together on the same platform, and putting questions at the same time. That is misrule, disorganization; and, as I should read it, evincive of an utter incapacity for popular government. Can it be otherwise? How can it be possible that foreigners coming from abroad, from the continent of Europe, raised and trained and impressed by forms of government as unlike to ours as one thing can be to another, should find themselves upon their arrival here, enlightened, informed, considerate, thoughtful, and more than all, regardless of the true spirit of American liberty? It is utterly impracticable in itself, and to attempt it, I should think can lead only to misrule and disorganization, as it has done. But still, I would say to my honorable friend from Tennessee, I do not read the Constitution of the United States as he does. That is a matter that belongs to the States, and it is incident to our form of government, the States being sovereign, having the right to direct their own affairs in their own way. I protest that any vote which we may give here for the admission of Minnesota is not expressive of any opinion whatever, either for or against any feature contained in her constitution, except that it is republican in its form.

I have thought it proper, on my part, in order to avoid misapprehension, to say thus much only to exclude the conclusion that by my vote to admit this State, I mean to express any opinion on this part of her constitution, far less any approval.

Mr. STUART. I do not intend to continue this debate, because I am very anxious that Minnesota shall be admitted into the Union; and I should not say a word but for the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, in attributing the divisions in the Minnesota convention, and certain other divisions in the northwestern country, to the influence of the foreign vote. Why, sir, you might as well attribute them to an eclipse of the moon. These are divisions that grow out of party politics, and nothing else. The foreign vote in Minnesota, that is, that vote which is described as a foreign vote, is, as it is in other States of the Union, composing but a very small proportion of the whole vote. The difficulty in the Minnesota convention was a party difficulty, a question of whether certain delegates were elected or not, and each political organization claiming to have a majority, seized upon the earliest opportunity to organize, with a view to securing that result. The Senator, I apprehend, under his reasoning, would find it difficult to distinguish between the action of that convention, the action of a certain Legislature to which he referred, and the action of the House of Representatives of the United States at the last Congress. The House of Representatives were months before they were able to organize. Would it be said that that was on account of the foreign vote of the country? It might be said with equal propriety and with equal accuracy. Sir, I doubt if there was a man, certainly not any considerable number of men of either party, in the convention of Minnesota, who was a foreigner. The large majority of that body, like the large majority of every similar body in every State, were citizens, and native-born citizens of the United States. It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose that these difficulties, which originate in party politics alone, have their origin at all in the foreign vote of any particular portion of this country.

I agree with everything that the Senator from Virginia said in respect to the authority of the States over this question. It is a question with which Congress, in my humble judgment, has nothing to do; but it is entirely and completely within the power of every State in the Union to say who shall exercise the right of suffrage within that State. I should be very sorry ever to see the day arrive when any other doctrine should prevail. I have certain views of my own in regard to the intelligence of foreigners as compared with the intelligence of many portions of the native-born citizens of the country; but it is not necessary to express them here. I have no disposition, as I have said, to prolong this debate; quite the contrary. I wish this debate brought to a close. I think this State ought to have been admitted long ago. In my opinion we have done her manifest injustice by delaying the question so long as we have done. I rose only to correct the misapprehension of the honorable Senator from Virginia, in supposing that these difficulties grew at all out of the fact that the votes of persons other than citizens of the United States were cast for some of the members of the Minnesota convention.

Mr. BELL. I do not wish to detain the Senate; but, like the Senator from Michigan, I do not desire to be misunderstood. He trusts never to see the day when Congress, or any other power, shall control the right of a State to regulate this question as it thinks proper. That is a general proposition which I had to meet before in the former debate on this subject. I went into examples. The States have a right to admit minors and females if they choose. I never denied it. The single point, whether as the Constitution of the United States has provided that the Congress may enact uniform rules for the naturalization of foreigners, it is in the power of the States to confer citizenship on them. The States may authorize minors of five years of age, if they please, to vote at the elections, and male and female. That is undisputed. The question is in regard simply to the class of residents as to whom the Constitution has made distinct provision, and Congress has prescribed the mode by which they should become citizens of the United States. That is the only exception to the absolute and uncontrolled power of the States to regulate the right of suffrage or say who may be citizens. I said when I was up before that I wished to be understood; that, seeing the views which existed both North and South, I did not propose myself to make it an objection to the admission of Minnesota; still I desire to express my opinion, as I did two years ago, that it was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and it was a dangerous precedent.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote most cheerfully, Mr. President, for the admission of Minnesota into the sisterhood of free commonwealths. I am sure no State welcomes her more cordially than the Commonwealth whose vote I now give. Informalities have occurred; but these informalities have been all rectified by the popular vote freely given—a vote approaching unanimity. Whatever may have been the faults of the representatives of the people in convention, the people gave their sanction to this instrument, and I bow to their will.

I do not however, Mr. President, approve of this portion of the constitution concerning the right of suffrage. Had I been a member of the convention I should have opposed it. Had I been an inhabitant of Minnesota I should have been opposed to it. I should have done all in my power to have required men of foreign birth to have been naturalized before extending to them the right of suffrage. I should have opposed the policy of excluding native Americans who have had the bad taste to be born with African blood in their veins. My voice and my vote would have been given to extend to men born on our own soil, with African blood coursing through their veins, the right of suffrage. Many of them are the descendants of brave and patriotic men who periled their lives and shed their blood to win independence and the liberties we now enjoy—the independence and the liberties which now confer upon us the power to degrade and oppress their race.

The State I represent confers upon men of color the right of suffrage; and she has no reason to regret this act of equal justice. Massachusetts requires a residence of one year in the State; six months in the town where the vote is to be given; the payment of a poll-tax assessed within two years; and she also requires a registry of the person proposing to vote. These requirements secure a ballot-box as pure as the lot of humanity will permit. For nearly a quarter of a century I have annually attended elections. I do not know that, in all that time, I ever saw an illegal vote given, or saw a blow struck, at or about the polls. The votes are taken even in the most exciting contests with quite as much regularity as they are taken in the Halls of Congress.

Naturalized citizens are allowed to vote in Massachusetts. Persons are sometimes naturalized by political parties in order to carry a particular election in some localities. The tendency of this system is to make the persons so naturalized the willing or unwilling tools of parties or individuals. This policy does not tend to the purity of the ballot-box, and much feeling often grows out of it during excited political contests. In order to reform the abuses to which this policy leads, the Legislature has proposed an amendment to the constitution, requiring two years' residence after naturalization. It is believed the adoption of this amendment will tend to secure more personal independence in the voter, for it destroys the immediate motive of the partisan to secure the naturalization of foreigners to carry particular elections—to attain certain results. Parties and party men will hardly engage in the work of hunting up foreign-born inhabitants, and raise money to secure their naturalization, if the votes cannot be given under two years. This is a long while for excited partisans to wait for the results of their labors, especially in these fluctuating times. Everywhere we hear sad stories of the impurities of the ballot-box, which we all regard as the palladium of our liberties. Statesmen, in framing constitutions and laws, should labor to secure equality of rights, and the purity of the elective franchise. But whatever our opinions may be in regard to this portion of the constitution of Minnesota, it is not for Congress, but for the people of that State to decide upon it.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understood him, says that if he had been a citizen of Minnesota he would have voted against the provision in her constitution which admits aliens or unnaturalized foreigners to vote, and which excludes negroes born in the country from voting. Inasmuch as he would not have had an opportunity to vote against that provision, because the whole constitution was submitted, and he must take that or no constitution, I will ask him whether he would have voted against the constitution on those grounds?

Mr. WILSON. If I had been a member of the convention I should have voted against it. I cannot say what I should have done if I had been simply a voter in Minnesota; but if I had voted for the constitution with such a provision in it, I should have done so with the greatest possible reluctance. Circumstances might have been such that I should have voted for it, but my impression is, that if I had been a citizen of Minnesota, I should not have voted for a constitution with such provisions in it. That is my impression now I cannot tell certainly what I should have done if I had resided there, and known all the circumstances of the case.

Mr. CLAY. I do not propose to reply to anything that has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts. I only wish to direct attention to it in order "to point a moral and adorn a tale," which may be written hereafter. I rise now mainly to say that I shall vote against the admission of Minnesota, but not for the reason that she has excluded negroes certainly, nor for the reason that she has admitted unnaturalized foreigners to the right of suffrage, although I disapprove that myself. I concur entirely in what was said by the Senator from Virginia, and his remarks will prevent me from saying some things that I had intended to say. I shall simply remark now, that while I shall vote, perhaps alone with the Senator from Maryland against the admission of Minnesota, I shall do so for different reasons than those stated by him, and for reasons which I assigned in voting against the enabling act at the last session, and which I do not think it necessary to repeat, as I do not suppose they would influence the vote of any other Senator.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no apology to make for consuming the time of the Senate on this question. I shall vote for the bill admitting Minnesota into the Union; but I shall do so under a solemn protest against some principles contained in her constitution. The provision which authorizes aliens to vote, I think is in opposition to the spirit and letter of the Federal Constitution. Originally the right to naturalize foreigners belonged to the colonies respectively. The power did not belong to the old Confederation; but when the Constitution of the United States was formed, the power to provide for the naturalization of foreigners was given it to Congress, and it was given for the purpose of establishing a uniform rule. The several States at that time delegated to Congress express power to pass uniform laws of naturalization. The States made no reservation of any portion of that power, but gave all to the Congress of the United States. Congress, under this grant of power, has proceeded to pass naturalization laws, and some of the States, in contravention of them, have undertaken to make aliens citizens of the several States, who are not citizens of the United States. Sir, to my mind, it is an absurdity to say that a man can be a citizen of a State, with Federal relations, who is not a citizen of the United States; and that an alien can have a right, by virtue of State authority, to vote for members of Congress and presidential electors, because the State confers upon him the power to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. I think there is an inconsistency between the power delegated to the Federal Government over this subject, and the power which has been attempted to be exercised by some States. I insist that no man can be a citizen of a State who is not a citizen of the United States. The greater must include the less. The Federal Government being more extensive than a State government, and embracing all the States, must have an overriding power on this subject, under the grant contained in the Constitution. This power is expressly granted to Congress, and hence a State cannot exercise it.

Moreover, to show the inconsistency of it, do you not see at once that if you allow the States to exercise this power, there will be no uniformity. There was not uniformity in this respect before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and for that reason the power was conceded to Congress to pass naturalization laws which should be uniform in all the States. I admit that a State has the power to restrict and regulate citizenship and to say who shall be citizens, provided the persons whom they admit are citizens of the United States. If the Government of the United States has passed a law for the purpose of naturalization, and has naturalized a foreigner under it, any State can require him to remain in the State for a reasonable length of time before allowing him to exercise the rights of citizenship within that State, but it cannot unmake him as a citizen of the General Government. A man may be a citizen of the General Government though he is not a citizen of any State; but I insist that no man can be a citizen of a State who is not a citizen of the United States. Nor, sir, is the view which I take an infringement of the rights of the States. It merely secures uniformity. This uniformity, I think, is required by the Constitution, which confers upon the citizen of one State the rights and privileges of a citizen in the several States. That harmonizes perfectly with the power of naturalization and makes it uniform.

Again, to allow the States to confer the right of citizenship on an alien, would be unjust to the naturalized citizen. He undergoes a probation of five years before he becomes a citizen of the United States; and, though he be a citizen of the United States, he may not be a citizen of any State; he may be a citizen of the District of Columbia. If a State can allow an alien, after arriving upon our shores, and declaring his intention to become a citizen, to exercise all the rights of a citizen, is it just to the man who has been naturalized under the Federal law? Is it allowable that the States shall have it in their power to confer the privileges of citizenship upon persons who owe no allegiance to the United States? Suppose such a man should go into a foreign country: could he take a passport from the Federal Government? No, sir. Suppose he should be involved in difficulties, so that it would become necessary, if he were a citizen of the United States, to make reclamation for wrongs done to him in person or property: could the United States interpose? could they make any demand on the foreign Government? The Executive has a supervision of our foreign relations; but, if this policy be admitted, a State might involve the Federal Government in difficulties with foreign nations without its consent. I insist that it is not a legitimate act on the part of the States, nor is it within the pale of the Constitution of the United States, for them to undertake to create aliens citizens. It is unjust to the naturalized foreigner; it is unjust to the native-born citizen. What, sir, take an alien, not naturalized, irresponsible to this Government, owing it no allegiance, who cannot commit treason against this Government, who is not a citizen of the United States, and confer upon him the right of suffrage in a State! He may be an incendiary; he may be a deserter; he may commit crimes against this Government; but you cannot punish him for treason. He may coalesce or confederate with an enemy; but he cannot commit treason against this Government, because he is not a citizen of it. Is it proper to invest such a man with the highest prerogatives of a freeman? In monarchies, the head of the Government is the center of power; the sovereignty resides in the person of an individual, and he is supreme. In this country, supreme power resides in the people; it is distributed through them; and every citizen of the United States participates in that sovereignty. I insist that you have no right to invest an alien with any portion of the sovereignty that belongs only to native and to naturalized citizens; and the moment you do it, you go in direct violation of the principles of our institutions, and in the face of the Constitution of the country.

I might present many other views upon this point, but I do not wish to consume the precious time of the Senate. I shall vote for the admission of Minnesota into the Union, but with a solemn protest in behalf of the State I represent, at least, against the principle of authorizing aliens to vote and share the sovereignty of this people. I consider it a usurpation of our rights for any State to attempt to incorporate an alien into the privileged sovereignty of this people.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate, but I desire to say a few words on this subject. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Of course, when a foreigner comes into the United States, he cannot, until he is naturalized and becomes a citizen of the United States, claim protection of this Government. After being naturalized and becoming a citizen of the United States, it makes no odds where he goes, no matter in what part of the globe he may be, he can claim the protection of the United States. We have a striking illustration of this in the Koszta case, where Mr. Marcy gave an able opinion that when an individual had only declared his intention to become a citizen, the United States took cognizance of the case and gave him protection. We see, then, the importance of becoming a citizen of the United States, though the individual may not have the privileges conferred upon a voter in any one of the several States. But it seems to me we run the thing into confusion; it may be that I am confused myself. The Constitution further provides:

"The citizens of each State"— not of the United States—

"shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Now what has that to do with conferring upon a foreigner the privilege of going into any one of the sovereign States and voting, unless he possesses the qualifications required by that State? I think one meaning of that clause of the Constitution is this: it was intended to prevent the States from discriminating between each other. For instance, take North Carolina; it was intended that she should not pass a law conferring privileges upon the citizens of New York or Pennsylvania that the citizens of the other States would not be entitled to exercise upon coming into her borders. It is to prevent one State from discriminating between citizens of the different States; in fact, it has no reference to a citizen of the United States. It was to prevent Tennessee, for instance, from passing a law saying that Massachusetts should not bring her articles into Tennessee, and that Pennsylvania might bring hers. This provision of the Constitution covers the case, and provides that the citizens of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts coming into Tennessee shall exercise privileges alike. It does not say that they shall come into Tennessee and exercise all the privileges of citizens of Tennessee in reference to voting, or anything else, but that they shall be treated alike in Tennessee if they go there.

The distinction is clear. There are many reasons why a man may be a citizen of the United States, and strong reasons, too, and yet not be admitted as a qualified voter of a State. This provision of the Constitution is often quoted inaccurately, and still more inaccurately understood. It is said that citizens going out of their own State are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the State to which they go. That is not the Constitution, but it is that citizens of the different States shall all exercise the same privileges in a State into which they may go. So we see that does not cover the idea now presented, that if a citizen of the United States emigrates into one of the States, he is entitled to go to the polls and vote, unless he has the qualifications prescribed by that State.

There were scarcely any two States composing the Confederacy at the formation of the Government, in which the qualification of voters was exactly alike. This shows that it was not intended to bring about uniformity. Some States required a man to be a freeholder; others required a certain amount of personal property. The States even differed as to the age at which persons should be qualified to vote. But if the doctrine now advanced be true, when a man is once a citizen of the United States, every State into which he goes is compelled to let him vote, regardless of every other qualification which its laws may prescribe.

Upon this point I will say that I am not in favor of admitting everybody to vote without the requisite qualifications; but I desire it to be distinctly understood, at the same time, that I do not sanction the doctrines which are promulgated by a party that recently sprang up in the country and has as rapidly passed away. I disclaim all power on the part of the Congress of the United States to interfere with the right of a State to fix the qualification of its voters; and although I might object to the qualification fixed in the constitution of Minnesota, that is a matter to be determined, not by Congress, but by the people of Minnesota. Repeating the language of my honorable friend from Texas, but making a somewhat different application of it, I hold the doctrine that power resides with the people, and it is for the people of each State to fix the qualifications of voters in that State, and not for the Congress of the United States.

A great deal has been said in reference to foreigners. Some of them are unfortunate; some of them drift upon our shores, and they are not exactly the description of population we should like; but it seems to me that we might find a better, a higher, a loftier theme on which to let forth our eloquence than to abuse and appeal to the prejudices of the country about a few foreigners who may come to our land. The whole idea seems to be that if they were kept here twenty-one years in a degraded condition, degraded from the fact of being excluded from the exercise of the privileges of a citizen, you would thereby improve them and qualify them much better to go to the ballot-box. Mr. President, when you examine the true philosophy of that question, the converse of that proposition is precisely true. Your naturalization law, as it now stands, cannot be much bettered. It requires a man to file his declaration of intention three years before he becomes a citizen, and he must remain in the United States five years; he must furnish proof before one of the courts of the country that he is a man of good moral character; that he is attached to your institutions, and to your republican form of government. He must give such evidence of his attachment to the country, and of his moral character, as the court will be satisfied with, and upon being satisfied with it, the court administers to him the proper oaths, and he becomes a citizen of the United States. If a man, coming into this country, cannot show to your courts that he is of good moral character, that he is devoted to the institutions of your country, if he is a bad man, if he is an immoral man, if he is in favor of despotism and opposed to the institutions of this country, is not five years long enough to keep him here? Oh! no, say this new party, let us keep him twenty-one years. I say that as soon as a man can furnish evidence that he is qualified to become a citizen, both as to his character and his devotion to our free institutions, the better for him, and the better for the country to let him be a citizen. Five years is too long to keep a bad man; twenty-one years is a great deal worse. Instead of keeping them here twenty-one years before they should become citizens of the United States, the true doctrine would be to compel them, in five years, to show that they were men of good moral character, devoted to the institutions of the country, and fit to become citizens, and if they are not, they should leave the country. I would make them citizens at the earliest moment. There is really nothing in the question of time when squared by sound philosophy. One man may remain here one hundred years and never be qualified, while another, from a knowledge of your institutions, from an admiration of your government, from his good moral character, may be qualified for citizenship the instant he places his foot upon our shores. I think the five years fixed by the naturalization laws now is a reasonable time, and gives an opportunity for the ascertainment of the fact upon which the issuing of his naturalization papers depends. That fact is that he is of good moral character and devoted to the institutions of the country, and when the court is satisfied of that fact with reference to any man, I say let him become a citizen; and if he cannot show that he is fit to become a citizen at the end of five years, that is long enough to keep him here.

I shall vote for the admission of Minnesota into the Union, because I believe her constitution, taking its leading features, is republican in its character; and considering that all power resides with the people, it is for them in their own States, and not for Congress, to fix the qualification of their voters.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to express my concurrence in the main views of the Senator from Texas. I think his position exactly right. He votes for the admission of Minnesota, with a protest against the improper features of her constitution. I join in that protest; and if I had the slightest dream that my vote was to be construed into an indorsement of the constitution, I would withhold it, or put it upon the other side. But I desire to ask the Senator from Texas whether he approves of that other remarkable feature of this constitution, upon which he did not comment, which grants to Indians who have adopted the habits of civilization the right of suffrage. My friend is the especial champion of the aboriginal tribes here, and whenever you strike an Indian you seem to make a personal issue with my friend.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has not been suspected of striking at Indians himself. Though he lived in their neighborhood, I always understood him to be very kind to them. I will assure him that I do most cordially approve of the provision. I think it very important. I will barely remark that those Indian tribes who had opportunities of organizing themselves into communities, are quite as civilized and as well regulated as we are ourselves, and I think it well to encourage them whenever they evince a disposition to become civilized and Christianized.

Mr. BROWN. That is well enough as a sort of general reply; but the language of the Minnesota constitution is that Indians who have adopted the habits and customs of civilization shall be allowed to vote. That kind of phraseology, it seems to me, lets in all the Indians of the country. All you have to do is to catch a wild Indian in all Minnesota, give him a hat, a pair of pantaloons, and a bottle of whisky, and he would then have adopted the habits of civilization, and be a good voter. [Laughter.] Whole tribes will be carried up to vote in this way.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the way they did vote.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Maine says that is the way they did vote. This, however, is the business of Minnesota, not mine. I think it all wrong; and if I had any power to correct it, or any right to interpose, I would do so. This feature of her constitution is infinitely more objectionable to me than that one which tolerates foreigners in exercising the right of suffrage. I agree with the Senator from Texas, and other Senators, that men who have not taken the oath of allegiance to the Government, ought not to participate in its elections, State or national; but I would much rather—and there I differ from the Senator from Texas—give to the least gifted of those who come to our shores, or, in the language of the Senator from Tennessee, who are drifted here, and the least educated of them, the right of voting after they get here, than to confer the same right on these breechless savages, who are made to adopt the habits of civilization, in the language of this constitution, on the day of election, by putting on the garb of white men, to be doffed the hour after the election is over.

But I know of no way by which you can correct this evil; I know of no authority in Congress to strike this clause from the constitution; and if you had the power to do it, I know enough of the relations existing between the Federal and State governments to know that, if Minnesota is in love with it, she can put it back to-morrow, and then, being entirely independent of the action of Congress, it would remain there. I simply content myself, therefore, with protesting against it, and protesting that no one is to assume that I indorse it when I vote to admit this State into the Union.

While I do not concur in the reasoning of the Senator from Texas, I do concur in his main conclusions. I think that a State may authorize a foreigner to vote without his being naturalized; I think a State may authorize a civilized Indian to vote; but certainly it is going a great way to assume that when he has simply adopted the habits of civilization, you are to allow him to vote, without defining what shall be considered an adoption of the habits of civilization. If he is not taxed, you cannot enumerate him; you cannot even count him in making up the sum of population; and yet he can vote. You give him the right of suffrage, and you do not even enumerate him as one of the population of the State. That is carrying the thing a great way. But if he is a foreigner inhabiting the country, you must enumerate him; and if the State chooses, it may confer on him the right of suffrage; but the right conferred in Massachusetts cannot be carried by the same man to Virginia, unless he has taken the oath of allegiance. It is a citizenship of the United States, and not of a particular State, that confers on him the right of suffrage. If he be a citizen of the United States, then he may be a citizen of any one of the States, and must stand upon the same footing in Virginia that a native son of Massachusetts would stand.

I understand that clause of the Constitution quoted by my friend from Tennessee, to mean that Virginia cannot make a distinction between the adopted and native-born citizens of Massachusetts; that she cannot confer a privilege on the Senator from Massachusetts, and deny the same privilege to a citizen of that State, who has been naturalized under the laws of Congress, though he was born in France, or Spain, or Ireland. If he be a citizen of the State, without regard to birth, he carries with him all the privileges of any other citizen. No distinction is to be made in Virginia between citizens of Massachusetts, of native or of foreign birth. That is what I understand by it. In other words, Virginia cannot say that the native-born citizens of Massachusetts shall vote, and that the adopted citizens, if they are citizens of the United States, made so under the act of Congress, shall not vote; but if they be simply and alone authorized to vote by the laws of Massachusetts, then they do not carry that local right to any one of the other States: that is not being a citizen. The right of voting and the rights of citizenship are two things separate and distinct. The right of suffrage does not necessarily involve the right of citizenship. The right of citizenship does involve the right to vote, because that is a right which belongs to every citizen, and cannot be taken from one class and denied to another class—that is all. You cannot deny the naturalized citizen the right of suffrage, and give it solely to the native citizen—I mean, of course, as a general rule. One single State might do it, but still that naturalized citizen, if he went to any other State, would not carry with him that disability to the State in which he went. It is a disability which simply attaches to him in his locality.

Mr. STUART. If I understand the Senator from Mississippi—and I really wish to understand him on this point—I quite agree with him. My position is, that every State has a right to say who shall exercise the right of suffrage.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. STUART. Now, sir, if a man is a citizen of the United States by naturalization, and has certain rights in Massachusetts, he does not carry with him into Mississippi any of those rights, unless Mississippi chooses to give them to him—I mean the right of suffrage. Mississippi may say that, of the two men going from Massachusetts, one a natural-born citizen, and the other a naturalized citizen, the one who is a citizen by birth may vote in Mississippi; and the other, who is a naturalized citizen, shall not. I think it is competent for Mississippi to say so.

Mr. BROWN. Then we differ. I hold that, if they are citizens, you have no right to apply the rule; otherwise, it will not make them equal. But they must be citizens of the United States. As to what may constitute, in the technicalities of local law, citizenship in a State, that is a different matter. But when a man is a citizen of the United States, native-born or naturalized, I hold, if he and a native-born citizen pass from one State into another, the State into which they go has no right to make distinctions between them on account of their birth. That is my doctrine. If they are citizens of the United States, one native-born and the other adopted according to law, and pass from Massachusetts to Virginia, I maintain that Virginia cannot then make a distinction between them. She must treat them alike.

But I did not rise to discuss the question. I only wanted to sound my friend from Texas, and I am sorry I have been betrayed an inch beyond that—to know what he thought of letting Indians vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. I simply say to my friend from Mississippi that it is fortunate that he and I arrive at the same conclusion, though I may not arrive at it by the same process that he does. Some men jump to conclusions, others have to travel laboriously. I may travel rather slowly to my conclusions, but I think I have arrived at a correct result. The Senator objects to my reasons, but as he approves the conclusion, I shall not quarrel with him at all.

Now, sir, as to the question which he has raised in regard to the Indians. I have no disposition to make it a subject of remark at this time, or to connect it with this bill. The constitutional power of a State to allow Indians to become citizens has, I think, never been denied, and therefore it is not necessary to discuss that point. I think they can be admitted to all the rights of citizenship without difficulty, but I have no idea that aliens can be. I think the people of Minnesota are competent judges to decide whether the Indians living with them are fit associates for them or not in the exercise of political power. If they are reconciled to it, I certainly am. If the constitution requires them to assume the habits of civilization before they can vote, the people of Minnesota can determine whether or not they are the proper subjects of the benefit which this constitution confers upon them. Having opportunities of daily intercourse with them, doubtless they can determine whether they are such persons as ought to vote, or it will be in the power of the Legislature at any time to specify particularly the qualifications requisite to enable an Indian to vote. I can see no impediment that that feature presents to the admission of the State.

But my friend from Tennessee remarks that there was a fuss made about foreigners, and he spoke of a political party which had risen and passed off very suddenly. If he lives as long as I have done in the world, and witnesses as many political events as I have, he will see that there is no party entirely permanent. Parties are always passing in and passing out. Whether the present condition of matters is to stand, I will not venture the speculation; but I think, when he has lived as long as I have done, he will find many changes taking place. I have no doubt that changes are in progress now, if we could only comprehend them; we may suspect them, though we cannot see them; but time will develop them. Notwithstanding what he has said, I do not believe I have before heard the word foreigner repeated in the Senate for some time; and, though the Senator's remark seemed to apply to me, I certainly made no allusion to foreigners, that I recollect, in anything that I said this morning. I only said that it was unjust to foreigners who have been naturalized to require of them the probation necessary for them to become citizens of the United States, if you allowed the States to admit others to the privileges of citizenship without any probation at all. I said nothing derogatory to them; I spoke of aliens as aliens, and I spoke of naturalized citizens as citizens, and as sharing a portion of the sovereignty of the people of the United States and of this Government; but I do not think, and I cannot believe, for one moment, that it is necessary or proper to admit foreigners, right off hand, to all the privileges of citizens. I cannot see any advantage in it. The Senator from Tennessee thinks that even a shorter period than now required, a very short period, would be long enough for them to be changed from subjects of a foreign Government to citizens of this country. Now, sir, I should like to know to what tribunal he would refer them for the adjudication of their qualifications as citizens; for thousands of them, even in my own State, cannot speak the English language and cannot read anything printed in English. How would he determine as to their qualifications? Would it not require a very tedious and laborious examination to ascertain whether they understood the Constitution of the United States, all the laws of the State of Texas, the rights of person and property, and all other things necessary to be understood, to be good citizens. Persons reared in the United States, who have but ordinary opportunities, generally have a general comprehension of these subjects, though they may not be familiar with all the details. I think five years short enough, and if the period were four times as long, I do not think it would be too much.

It is no degradation or reflection on a man that you do not allow him to vote at the polls. A foreigner, as a general thing, is elevated when he comes here; he is benefited in his circumstances; he is improved in his social condition; he is permitted to labor, and to enjoy the fruits of the labor of his hands, without burdensome or oppressive taxation; his rights are vindicated as well as if he were in the most eminent position in society; and he derives actual benefits from his migration to this country. If he is a decent man he can live very well without voting; and if he is not a decent man, the result of allowing him to vote is that he can get a little drunker than he otherwise would if he comes to the polls, and is pulled by the sleeve, and solicited to vote for this or that ticket. The privilege of voting is very unfortunate to many foreigners who come here. If they were permitted to toil in their shops or labor upon their farms upon election day they would be much better off than by being dragged to elections, and getting involved into difficulties there, squandering their means and getting intoxicated. The longer you postpone them the greater blessing it is to them, unless where the voting places are very convenient to them. I do not think it is degrading to a man not to allow him to vote. I have seen men of high respectability and position in society who never voted because they did not like the candidates; and it is so at every election within my knowledge. You can always find some individuals who will not exercise the right of suffrage. What is the necessity of forcing it on people who have not required it? There has been no demand here from foreigners for the privilege of voting that I have ever heard of. I never heard that they complained of it as a badge of degradation that they were not permitted to vote. No, sir; the clamor arises from other motives and other feelings, and it is made by other persons—by those loving patriots who wish to vindicate their rights, and whose philanthropy overflows the land. They are the persons who involve foreigners in these matters. I have had many connections with foreigners, and I have found them as gentlemanly as native-born citizens; but I have no opinion of those who are unprepared and unqualified to exercise without restraint the rights of citizenship. I will not concede to such men the day after they arrive upon our soil the highest privilege that is accorded to our best men, to men "who are native, and to the manner born." But, Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, it has been long since I adopted it as a lesson learned from the party with which I have heretofore acted, that we have only a right to look into this constitution for the purpose of seeing whether it is republican in its form. That question was debated at the time of the admission of Missouri, in the year 1820. Those who were in favor of the admission with the constitution which she presented, all contended that the true doctrine of the Constitution of the United States was that we had no right to interfere with the provisions of a State constitution, except simply to perform what was regarded as the only Federal duty—that of seeing that the form of government was republican. That opinion, I confess, I do not now entertain as strongly as I have done, but I will not quit it upon this occasion. It has been my guide on subjects of this kind for a long time; but, as I have said, I do not entertain it so strongly now as I have done heretofore. Still, I will not make this the occasion of departing from it. I shall reserve to myself, however, the right of doing so hereafter. Guided by this principle, then, I look at the constitution of Minnesota to see whether it is republican in its form, and find that it is. If I could be permitted, or thought it my duty now, an absolute duty, to look into all the provisions of this constitution, I should vote against it, for the reasons assigned by my friend from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY.] The idea of a State having a right to make a citizen of the United States, is, to my mind, perfectly untenable. I will not pretend to argue it, simply because it has been argued already to a demonstration by one of the greatest constitutional lawyers, and certainly as great a logician as ever sat in this body, Mr. Calhoun. If Mr. Calhoun's speech does not establish the proposition, I am sure no force will be added to it by my attempting to repeat his arguments. A State has no right to make a citizen of the United States; and it would be strange if she had a right to make an agent whose agency was to affect every State in the Union and the General Government.

Sir, my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] seems to think that although a State may not have the constitutional capacity to make a citizen, she can yet confer the right of suffrage within her own limits upon one who is not a citizen of the United States. I am sure if he will, with the candor and judgment that generally distinguish him, reconsider that matter, he will himself abandon such an opinion. Suffrage is the great element of citizenship; it is the great right which citizenship confers. If a State has no right to confer citizenship, I say it has no right to give a single particle of political power to any who are not citizens of the United States. They must be citizens before they can vote. The right to vote is inseparable with the right of citizenship. There may be a citizen who has not always the right to vote wherever he may happen to be. The States may very well add, as they do everywhere, provisions auxiliary to the proper exercise of this general right of suffrage to an American citizen. They may regulate it by requisitions for residence, for the payment of taxes, any local provision of that sort; but they have no authority to confer the right of suffrage on any one not a citizen. That is reserved as the great distinguishing right of the American citizen, whether he has become such citizen by birth or naturalization.

Sir, I design these remarks simply to explain the only ground on which I could possibly vote for the admission of this State, that such vote would be consistent with my action all along, and the opinions which I entertain, opinions which I say have been very much shaken on this question; but I will not make this the occasion of departing from my ancient line of conduct on this subject.

Mr. GREEN. I do not deem it necessary to go into a discussion of the constitutional points on which we may all differ. In the practical matter before us, I believe there is a general coincidence—shall we admit Minnesota or not? and coinciding in that, let us leave out these abstract points upon which we have no right to act; and as we have no right to act, I very much doubt our right to promulgate opinions upon them. I therefore hope we shall have the vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on the passage of the bill, resulted—yeas 49, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Sliedell, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Kennedy, and Yulee—3.

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone all prior orders, and go into executive session.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will let the next special order be taken up, and then he can make his motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move now, as we are in the humor of admitting States, that we proceed to the consideration of the bill to admit Oregon as a State. My object is to leave it as the unfinished business.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press that motion. I consider myself under honorable obligations to vote to take up the Pacific railroad bill next.

Mr. HUNTER. My motion was to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GWIN. I hope not. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, I think not more than two days ago, or perhaps three, offered the bill for the admission of Oregon. I am not aware that the bill has been printed; I certainly have never seen the bill, or the constitution of Oregon; and I would submit to that honorable Senator whether it would not be decorous to give us a little time to see what the people of Oregon propose as to the form of government, and see what their population is, and to learn something about it before it is brought into the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. The motion that is before us is to go into executive session, and the Senator debates the Oregon question. I object.

Mr. MASON. I am done.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division, yeas twenty-six, noes not counted; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 7, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL ROGERS.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PAYMASTERS' CLERKS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of the paymasters' clerks of the Army, for increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARMY CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, with accompanying papers, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 5th April, 1858; which were read, and are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, April 6, 1858.

SIR: I have received the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 5th instant, calling for "a full and minute statement of all contracts made in connection with the Utah expedition; the names of the persons with whom such contracts were made, and also the prices paid, or to be paid, for horses, mules, corn, and all other articles furnished for said expedition; the places where the horses, mules, &c., are to be delivered, and the prices to be paid for transportation of all such supplies; also, designating what contracts, if any, were made without public notice or advertising; and, if advertised, in what modes and at what places."

In reply, I have the honor to transmit herewith reports from the Quartermaster General and Commissary General of Subsistence, which give the information desired, so far as it is in the possession of this Department.

A quartermaster has been sent to Fort Leavenworth, with directions to purchase the requisite number of mules for the Army, at the lowest market price. What progress he may have made in these purchases, this Department is not, as yet, informed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker House of Representatives.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 6, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a statement, in tabular form, made under your orders, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on motion of Mr. LOVEJOY, on the 5th instant, containing the information sought for by it so far as it can be obtained in this office.

The only contracts that have been made for articles and supplies this year for the Utah expedition, or for their transportation, as far as it is known to me, are noticed in this statement, and the only notice or advertisement inviting bids for contracts that has been published, is the one calling for proposals for the transportation of supplies from depots on the Missouri river to Utah, and the posts in New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska. That advertisement was published in the following papers: the Kansas Herald, (Leavenworth, Kansas Territory;) Plate Argus, (Weaton, Missouri;) St. Joseph Gazette, (St. Joseph, Missouri;) Liberty Tribune, (Liberty, Missouri;) Western Dispatch, (Independence, Missouri;) American Citizen, (Lexington, Missouri;) Glasgow Times, (Glasgow, Missouri.)

Although only one printed notice calling for bids was given, yet it is proper to state that twenty-seven written propositions to sell horses and mules for the public service have been received at this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. H. JESUP, Quartermaster General.

Hon. J. B. FLOYD, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

CONTRACTS.

On the 23d of February, 1858, a contract was made with Robert S. Armistead and John W. Reid for furnishing beef cattle, (unworked steers,) as follows:

At Fort Leavenworth, Kansas Territory, two hundred and fifty head, by April 1, 1858, at $6 per one hundred pounds, net weight.

At Fort Kearny, Kansas Territory, five hundred head, by 20th May, 1858, at $7 per one hundred pounds, net weight.

At Fort Laramie, Nebraska Territory, seven hundred and fifty head, by 15th June, 1858, at $8 per one hundred pounds, net weight.

At Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, one thousand five hundred head, by 15th August, 1858, at $10 50 per one hundred pounds, net weight. This contract was entered into without public notice, after which the contractors proceeded to execute it, but finding the prices inadequate, as they alleged, and declaring their inability to comply with its terms, petitioned the department to be released, which was granted, and a commissary immediately ordered to make the purchases in open market.

In March, 1858, a contract was entered into with Russell, Majors & Waddell, for furnishing "beef cattle," (oxen from the trains,) as follows:

At Great Salt Lake City, or vicinity, Utah Territory, three thousand five hundred head, between 1st October, 1858, and 1st January, 1860, at $7 50 per one hundred pounds, net weight. This contract was made without public notice.

PURCHASES.

The above purchases were made from proposals under advertisement.

The following supplies have been ordered to be purchased in New York and forwarded, as follows, January 18, 1858: Forty-one thousand rations, "mixed vegetables," to Fort Leavenworth, for "troops on march to Utah."

Thirty-five thousand rations, "mixed vegetables," and 6,000 rations "desiccated potatoes" to Fort Kearny, for "troops on march to Utah."

The desiccated vegetables have been, or will be, purchased from Cassin, agent of Chollet & Co., but the prices have not yet been reported to the department. It is supposed, however, that they will not cost more than one cent per ration.

TIL. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, April 6, 1858.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the communication and accompanying documents be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Has the contract for beef been read?

The SPEAKER. Everything has been read. Mr. LOVEJOY. I want to make a statement in regard to it. That contract is no contract at all. It has been annulled.

The SPEAKER. It is so stated in the papers.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I want to say that another contract has been made with Russell, Major & Co., which has not been communicated to the House. I saw it yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That is stated in the papers.

Mr. FAULKNER's motion was then agreed to.

So the communication and accompanying documents were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXPLORATION OF THE AMOOR RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Department of State, transmitting the explorations of the Amoor River.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the communication was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON POLICE.

Mr. GOODE. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow Senate bill (No. 232) on the subject of a police force for this city, to be taken up, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with leave to report at any time, with the understanding that when it is reported back to the House, it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to come up when the House bill is taken up for consideration.

Mr. STANTON. That is right; but I desire to make a suggestion in connection with it. An amendment has been introduced by my colleague, [Mr. LEITER.]

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the request of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GOODE. Then I ask that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

CLERKS FOR UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill providing for the appointment of clerks for the district and circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

HOUR OF MEETING OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock, a. m., on to-morrow, and that the future meetings of this House, during the present session of Congress, shall be ten o'clock, a. m., unless an earlier hour be determined on by the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

DEFICIENCY BILL,

on which general debate was closed—Mr. LETCHER, who reported the bill, being entitled to the floor to make a closing speech.

Mr. LETCHER. I regret that the hour allowed to me under the rules of the House is not at all sufficient to enable me to reply to various objections made to the provisions of this bill. I shall therefore be compelled, in a great measure, to confine myself to some of the most prominent features of the bill, and to present my views upon them, even if I should be denied the privilege of devoting any time to others, that I regard as less material.

I feel, sir, that myself, and the committee with whom I act, are placed here in a very embarrassing position, by the course adopted in this discussion. We have been fired upon from our own side of the House in some half dozen speeches—some against all the provisions of the bill, others against some particular provisions of the bill, and others against other provisions of the bill; but all seeming to concur in the conclusion that unless the bill, in every provision, can be made exactly acceptable to each of them, he is prepared to vote it down, and to leave the Government without the means of carrying out the policy which it has inaugurated.

My friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who opened the discussion, occupies the ground of general opposition to the whole of it. He takes the ground that deficiency bills are improper and that they ought not to be allowed; and he and others, on the same side of the House, follow that up with the declaration that they are used by an Administration for no other purpose than to secure the adoption of its views, although Congress might have been originally opposed to them. He opposes it, also, on another ground: that it contains a provision which anticipates $3,000,000, in the way of expenditures for the coming twenty months, to be applied to the prosecution of the war in Utah; and he asks whether we have not strained the Constitution in introducing such a provision here? I maintain, sir, that we have not strained the Constitution; that we have, neither in spirit nor in letter, violated any one of its provisions; and that there are overwhelming considerations of propriety which operated on the Administration in making the recommendation, and which ought to operate on this House in adopting it.

For the last two or three years there has been a general complaint in both Houses of Congress, and throughout the country, that the late Administration had not performed its duty in allowing the Territory of Utah to be managed by officials entertaining the abominable sentiments and principles that characterize that people; and we have been told over and over again that it was the duty of the Administration to remove these officials, and to substitute others in their stead, to whom the administration of this territorial government should be committed. When this Administration came into power, these complaints were general everywhere. They came up from the country as they had been previously made in Congress. One of its very first acts, after its inauguration, was to consider this subject, and to commission new officers, who should go to Utah, and who were not liable to the same objections which were charged upon those holding official positions. For the purpose of escorting these officers to the Territory, and with no view of commencing any aggression whatsoever upon that people, but for the purpose of having at hand the means of protecting them in entering upon the discharge of their duties, the President accompanied them by a military escort of something like eighteen hundred men.

This, sir, was not a matter which was anticipated when the last Administration went out of power. It was not provided for in those estimates. There were no recommendations for transportation, for subsistence, for supplies, or for any other expenses which were incident to this movement upon the part of this Administration. These troops were sent to Utah, and they had to be furnished, as a matter of course. Now, sir, the Administration desire, as these troops are there, and as their policy has been indorsed by this House in a resolution which has been adopted by this body,

SURVEY IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to provide for the geological and mineralogical survey of the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

WAGON ROAD IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making appropriations for the construction of a wagon and emigrant road in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States two additional regiments of volunteers; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. HICKY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union."

RESOLUTIONS OF LEGISLATURES.

Mr. CLAWSON, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey in reference to the better preservation of life and property on the coast; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of that Territory for the establishment of a port of delivery at Whatcom, relative to enrolling clerks for the Legislative Assembly, relative to the erection of three additional land districts, and relative to the false reports made by General Wool concerning the late Indian war in Washington Territory.

The first three were severally referred to the Committee on Commerce, the Committee on Territories, and the Committee on Public Lands, and the last was laid on the table, and all ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBBINS, also, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey asking for donations of public lands for agricultural colleges; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bocock that they shall have the means of supplying these men; and they have recommended that $3,000,000 shall be appropriated in advance for the purpose of meeting the expenses of those troops.

Now, sir, let us see if there was not wisdom in that recommendation. Under the last Administration, by a contract entered into in February, 1857, the cost of transportation to Utah was $19 22 1-5 per one hundred pounds per one hundred miles. Under that Administration, two million two hundred and sixty-four thousand one hundred and thirteen pounds of military supplies were transported at these rates. The people themselves, in that Territory, who have been engaged in merchandizing or otherwise, have been put to a cost of from fourteen to fifteen cents per pound for the transportation of supplies to that Territory, many of which were transported by organizations, gotten up among themselves, and, of course, the supplies could be carried for something less than supplies for the Army can be transported.

Now let us see at what rates supplies can be transported to Utah, to Fort Laramie, and Fort Kearny.

Schedule of prices per hundred pounds per hundred miles to be paid to Russell, Majors & Waddell, contractors for transportation of military stores and supplies, under an agreement between Major General Thomas S. Jesup, Quartermaster General of the United States Army, on behalf of the United States, and the said firm of Russell, Majors & Waddell, bearing date at Washington city, on the 16th day of January, 1858.

Names of posts, or places from which stores are to be taken up.	Periods of starting from points mentioned in the agreement above referred to, and rates of payment, except on hard bread, bacon, pine lumber, and shingles, provided for in article eight of the agreement.
	January 1 to February 28.	March 1 to 31.	April 1 to 30.	May 1 to July 31.	August 1 to 31.	September 1 to 30.	October 1 to 31.	November 1 to December 31.
To Fort Kearny and intermediate posts.....	$3 55	$2 90	$2 00	$1 35	$1 50	$2 00	$2 90	$4 00
To Fort Laramie and posts beyond Fort Kearny.....	3 55	2 90	2 00	1 35	1 70	2 00	3 00	4 50
To Great Salt Lake City, or depot in Utah, and point beyond Fort Laramie.....	4 00	2 90	1 80	1 80	1 80	2 20	3 00	4 50

The above tabular rates to govern for all transportation not exceeding in the aggregate ten million pounds, and for the first additional five million pounds, or any part thereof, they shall be paid at the rate of twenty-five per centum advance on these tabular rates, and for all over and above said fifteen million pounds which they may be required to transport under this agreement, an advance of thirty-five per centum on these tabular rates shall be paid the contractors.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement right there?

Mr. LETCHER. I cannot yield, unless the committee will extend my time. If they will give me unlimited time, I will submit to any interruption from any gentleman on the floor.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. COLFAX. I trust the gentleman's time will be extended. This is an important subject.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I shall object, at this stage of the gentleman's remarks, to an unlimited extension of time. When his time is nearly out, if he is not able to complete his remarks, I shall have no objection to his time being extended.

Mr. LETCHER. If I consent to interruptions it must be upon the understanding that the House shall consent to an extension of my time. If my time is extended, I will cheerfully consent to be interrupted to any extent whatever, embarrassing as the situation may be.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I move that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended for one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition can be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I cannot yield. It is perfectly manifest that these supplies have to be transported to Utah, and that they can be transported for greatly less money between the 1st day of April and the 31st day of August than in any other period of the year. During that period these supplies can be transported for $1 80 per one hundred pounds for one hundred miles, or computing the distance at one thousand two hundred miles, at $21 60 per one hundred pounds for the entire distance to the Territory.

Now, sir, the Secretary of War, with very great propriety, and, as I think, with that due regard to the public interest which should characterize public officers, and which he has displayed in this matter, proposes to anticipate the regular appropriation, that would not, in all probability, be made before the last of July, about the rising of Congress, so as to purchase those articles, and to have them ready to send off from Fort Leavenworth at some period between the 1st of April and the 31st of August, when they can be transported at the rate of $1 80 per one hundred pounds per one hundred miles. I think the recommendation is a proper one on the score of economy; and what difference does it make whether we appropriate the money now or on the last day of July next?

There is the whole of it, and there is this whole objection that has been raised to anticipating appropriations, made by the gentlemen who have discussed this question on the other side. Now, sir, on the score of economy, those gentlemen ought to sustain this proposition; because, if their purpose shall be carried out, if this bill shall be defeated, if these articles shall be purchased from the appropriations made in the regular bill, then the Government is to pay from three to four and a half dollars for transportation; and not only that, but the Government is to run the risk of having the wagons overtaken during the winter, and the loss, probably, of the entire supplies. I put it, then, to the common, practical sense of the House, whether they are economists, or whether I am practicing on an economical rule, in the recommendations that I have presented from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Let us look at it again, Mr. Chairman, in another point of view, and see whether this contract is not an advantageous contract to the Government, and one for which the Secretary of War, instead of reproach, deserves commendation, at the hands of this and the other House. Why, sir, it is an immense business. How many wagons do you suppose will be required to carry on this transportation? how many yoke of oxen? how much other preparation will be required to meet the demands made by the Government under this contract? It will require two thousand four hundred and sixteen wagons to be used for transportation; and that is counting two trips to Fort Laramie and two to Fort Kearny during the year, and one to Utah. It will require two thousand four hundred and sixteen wagons to transport what is already ordered, to say nothing of what may be ordered hereafter. It will require twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and ninety-two oxen for this purpose. Wagons cost about one hundred and seventy dollars each, delivered at Fort Leavenworth. The oxen cost about ninety dollars a yoke. They travel in companies of twenty-five wagons, and there must be twenty-five teamsters—one to each wagon. Besides, there must be a wagon for the contractor to carry supplies for his men, which makes twenty-six in all; and there is a captain and a lieutenant and that train, who have charge of it. Yes, sir; and there must be extra teams if they carry a traveling forge, or anything of that kind, for they must be prepared with that and everything else necessary to enable them to supply adequately this train. When you come to count up all these items, to say nothing of the extra teams besides those I have enumerated, and those referred to by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. PHILLIPS], you have two thousand five hundred and thirteen wagons, thirty thousand one hundred and fifty-six oxen, two thousand five hundred and thirteen teamsters, one hundred and ninety-four captains and lieutenants, making in all two thousand seven hundred and seven men. And the capital which this contractor is required to raise on his own credit, without a dollar of advance from this Government, is something near two million dollars. And now, sir, when he has performed part of this service; when he is executing this contract, the House here say that they will not furnish the means to pay it; and that after running his credit to the last verge, they will not pay him for what he has done.

The views of the Secretary of War ought to be carried out in the execution of this contract. We know that property is as high now as it was a year or two ago. This party has to buy on credit, and of course he has to pay something additional on that account. He has to go into the market, furnish these wagons, these oxen, and hire these men for this hazardous service; and yet the increase in the cost of transportation is the difference between $19 22 1-5 and $21 60 under the existing contract with two million two hundred and sixty-four thousand one hundred and thirteen pounds to be transported under the nineteen-dollar contract, and four hundred and ninety-five thousand pounds already ordered under the twenty-one-dollar contract. Then I ask again, whether the Secretary of War has not shown forecast here which entitles him to credit, instead of censure, on the part of this House?

My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] told us that he was opposed to this bill because it was altogether too general in its terms; that there was nothing specific in it; and that he wanted to know what those words, "incidental expenses" mean? He says he does not understand what it means, and the committee does not inform him what it means. I would like to know whether he has read the bill; because, if he has, it is a marvel to me that in looking at the fiftieth line he did not discover what the "incidental expenses" covered. This clause of the bill states:

"For the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, consisting of postage on letters and packages received and sent by officers of the Army on public service; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, including the additional compensation to judge advocates, recorders, members, and witnesses, while on that service, under the act of March 16, 1802; extra pay to soldiers employed under the direction of the quartermaster's department, in the erection of barracks, quarters, storehouses, and hospitals; the construction of roads, and other constant labor, for periods of not less than ten days, under the acts of March 2, 1819, and August 4, 1834, including those employed as clerks at division and department headquarters; expenses of express-tes to and from the frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to paymasters, other disbursing officers, and trains, when military escorts cannot be furnished; expenses of the internment of non-commissioned and soldiers; authorized office furniture; hire of laborers in the quartermaster's department, including hire of interpreters, spies, and guides, for the Army; compensation of clerk to officers of the quartermaster's department; compensation of forage and wagon masters, authorized by the act of July 5, 1838; for the apprehension of deserters, and the expenses incident to their pursuit; the following expenditures required for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, and such companies of infantry as may be mounted, namely, the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horse and mule shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing, hire of veterinary surgeons, medicines for horses and mules, picket ropes, and shoeing the horses of those corps, $190,000."

The items are set out clearly and distinctly. The gentleman will see at once that it would be impossible to furnish the specific amounts required to cover each one of them. Then when these incidental expenses are mentioned, they are incidental expenses which can be ascertained from this bill, on reference to it, to pay for items the necessity for which every member can judge of for himself. If the incidental expenses shall not amount to the sum therein specified, then the balance will remain, not to be expended under that clause.

Now, sir, are the provisions of this bill, so far as the Army is concerned, less or more specific than the provisions of former bills in regard to the same subject? If my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] knows of a solitary instance in which a bill of appropriations for the Army has been more specific in its terms than the bill reported by us, I should be glad to know when such a bill was brought here, by whom brought here, and when it was considered by this House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LETCHER. I think the gentleman objected to giving me an extension of time, and I cannot now yield to him. In this connection, a gentleman on the other side of the House, with an air of very great confidence, rose yesterday in his place—I allude to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow]—and told us that the price of a soldier twenty years ago was $350, and that in the year 1858 it is $1,400. I will furnish him with a table that will show him exactly the cost per man, and which is a little over one half of the gentleman's estimate of yesterday:

Annual cost per man, military establishment.
Adjutant General.....	$ 15 06½
Quartermaster General.....	403 73
Paymaster General.....	252 32
Commissary General.....	55 77
Ordnance department.....	6 75
Medical department.....	5 60
	$ 5 83½

Mr. GROW. I read from the statement made in the Senate by Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. LETCHER. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROW. I do not want the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will look a little further he will find that out of this $786, $400 is for transportation. So that if the soldier cost, twenty years ago, $350, (deducting this increased transportation, owing to the acquisitions made to the country,) he only costs now $36 83 more than he did twenty years ago.

Now, sir, how comes this increased transportation? Let us see. Here is the Quartermaster General's account of it, and I think it is a very satisfactory account:

"Previous to the annexation of Texas our extreme western posts were Fort Wilkins, on Lake Superior; Fort Snelling, at the junction of the Mississippi river with St. Peter; Fort Atkinson, twenty-four miles from the Mississippi river; Fort Leavenworth, on the Missouri river; Fort Scott, on the southwestern frontier of the State of Missouri; Fort Gibson, on the waters of the Arkansas; Fort Washita, in the Choctaw country, near to Red river; Fort Towson, six miles from Red river; and Fort Jesup, twenty-four miles from that river. Of these posts, Fort Gibson, Leavenworth, Snelling, and Wilkins, were accessible by steamers; Fort Washita was eighty-six, and Fort Scott ninety miles from steam navigation; but the latter was situated in a well cultivated and rapidly improving country, and most of the heavy supplies for its garrison were obtained in the neighborhood. Fort Washita was then the only outpost depending upon the interior for all its supplies; and it was at a less distance from the post whence it was supplied than from Baltimore to Philadelphia; while several of the land routes over which the supplies for the troops are now transported are longer than from this city to St. Louis or New Orleans. There has been a vast increase in the cost of labor and of all supplies in the last ten years; but leaving that entirely out of view, the vast distances now to be traversed in territories with scarcely any other resources than a scanty supply of wild grass, with the constant operations necessarily being carried on, is sufficient to account for the increased individual cost of the military force."

Sir, is not this a satisfactory explanation of the increased cost attending the expense of a soldier from $350 to $786? In the very case now under consideration, here is a transportation of twelve hundred miles from Fort Leavenworth to Utah, which is the scene of this difficulty between the Territory and this Government, and where these troops are to be employed; Fort Laramie is some six hundred miles off, and Fort Kearny, I believe, between two and three hundred miles. We have acquired Texas, and the defense of that State is to be attended to. We have acquired the country on the Pacific coast, and that is to be attended to. We have acquired Oregon and Washington, where posts have been established, and to which transportation has to be made. Is it at all wonderful, then, that when the extent of our country is more than doubled, when we have that much more to defend than we had before, there should be an enhanced price for transporting troops, with a limited army of fifteen thousand men, to supply these posts as occasion and necessity require? Besides all that, a part of this very deficiency has been left as a legacy to this Administration from the preceding one. I have had a table prepared which I have here, showing how much was left over and when it accumulated.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON CITY, January 23, 1858.

J. SIBLEY, Major and Quartermaster.

Here, then, was a deficiency of $1,228,679 31, that has come down to this Administration, with estimates for which it did not prepare. It could not guard against this deficiency in any way whatsoever. And it has come down with this Utah difficulty accumulated upon it.

Sir, will it be contended here that the Secretary of War is to be arraigned because of this deficiency which has grown up under a previous Administration? Is he to be held accountable for it? I apprehend not. The expenditures already made on account of this Utah expedition, by the Quartermaster's department, are, for regular supplies, $27,776 40; incidental expenses, $10,828 96; mounts and remounts, $68,802 50; mileage, $2,500; for transportation of troops and for supplies, $1,411,876 33; barracks and quarters, $7,302 06; amounting, in the aggregate, to $1,529,086 25; and these are articles that are yet to be furnished, in order to supply these troops, to give them the means of support during the coming winter, and to protect them, to say nothing of the four additional regiments that the House has ordered. Let me say here that if this Utah expedition was improperly begun, if the President is to be arraigned for it here, I desire to know from gentlemen upon this floor why they did not raise this question on the day Congress met, and put an end to the expedition? If they thought that the expedition was begun wrong, or had been prosecuted unwisely, then was the time to begin, and they could then at once have said to him, "this thing is improper, and we order it to be stopped; bring home your troops." But this was not done, sir. They first adopt a resolution declaring that there is rebellion in Utah; they then come in here and pass a bill for four additional regiments, to enable the President to prosecute the war thus improperly begun. And now we are told that these moneys are to be withheld, because he did not call Congress together when he undertook the expedition, and get their consent before it was commenced. I say, then, sir, that the House is doing injustice to itself, after its own action in this matter, and still greater injustice to the President, when it proposes now to charge that this thing has been improperly done.

Sir, we have had a good deal said here upon another subject connected with this matter. I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] lending his name to this idea that is floating about in regard to contracts, and to the advantage that these contracts are to the War Department. He did, sir, very great injustice to himself, as well as very great injustice to the officer who presides over that Department, as the facts which have been brought before the House establish conclusively. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] was not content to rely upon insinuations. He charged that this Utah war was a war of plunderers and speculators, and said he did not know what it would cost to get these contracts at the War Department. Now, sir, has there been anything in the character or conduct of the Secretary of War which would justify an imputation of this sort upon him? Has the gentleman any evidence to warrant it? Why, yes, sir; he tells us that a contractor furnished him the information; but when called upon to give us the name of the contractor, he says that he cannot do it; that it might be that the seal of private confidence was upon that communication when made to him. Mr. Chairman, I ask him in all sincerity and kindness, if he could not furnish the name, why was not the seal of private confidence upon the communication, and why could it be given, and not the name? Why could the name not be furnished? Why was the statement made and the name not furnished? But now the report comes in, and the gentleman's allegations are distinctly met. Who is the contractor now? Who is it that has given currency to this libel against the head of the War Department? The gentleman will recognize the principle of law that, if he undertakes to circulate a report unfounded in fact against any one, and, when called upon, refuses to furnish the name of a responsible informant, he is held in law liable for the libel which he circulates. And I think that it would be so held not only in law, but in good morals. I therefore call upon the gentleman, in all kindness, to let us know who this libeler of the Secretary of War is. It is due to his reputation to inform us.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If the gentleman will give me time to refer to this discussion and set the matter right, I should like to do so, as soon as I get the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. I want the name; it does not take long to refer to that.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am responsible for all that I stated here.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, Mr. Chairman, since this controversy was begun, and since these imputations have been made on the Secretary of War, General Jesup, whom the gentleman from Illinois has referred to, has reported to this House; and that report, I tell the gentleman very respectfully, does not confirm what he says he is responsible for, or else I have misunderstood his speech. Now, when these contracts come in, what are they? Has the Government been plundered? Has the Secretary of War had anything to do with these contracts, individually? Has he done anything more than give them his approval, under the law of Congress which is laid down to him as a guide for his course? Look at the act of 1820, and see what the duty of the Quartermaster General is, and what the duty of the Secretary of War is, under particular circumstances. Section six provides:

"That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting, also, contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army and Navy, and contracts in the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of these Departments."

There is the law. I appeal to this House, after all that has been said, whether the Secretary of War does not stand here, by the papers, vindicated before the House and country in having conformed his action to this law of the land? When these contracts come here, is there any evidence furnished by them that the Government has been plundered, or that anybody has rewarded him, or the quartermaster, or any other person connected with the War Department, for the purpose of procuring them?

So far as one of these contractors is concerned, we find that the contract would have bankrupted the parties who made it. The Secretary of War released them from it, and sent out his quartermaster to make the necessary purchases for the Army. And, sir, every man who knows anything about it knows that, at the prices there proposed to be paid for this article of beef, the contractor could not hope to make a profit, but must have subjected himself to very great loss. I take it that it is the same with regard to the article of horses, fifteen hundred of which are ordered to be purchased by the quartermaster, and delivered at Fort Leavenworth. These horses must be of a particular description—must come up to the required standard; and the dealer must run the risk of transportation by steamboat and otherwise till they are delivered at the point specified in the contract. There they must be inspected; and the dealer runs the risk of the rejection of more or less of them; and he is only to be paid $159 for those that are rejected.

But the gentleman from Illinois says that this is a monstrous price, and that you can buy such horses at seventy-five or one hundred dollars at the outside. Now let me say to him that I have a friend here in the House who is willing to give to him the benefit of just such a contract; so that, if the gentleman is willing to take the contract, there will be a proposition, before this bill will be disposed of, to contract with the gentleman from Illinois, or with any other responsible person, to furnish such horses as the Government may want at $100 per head. Now we will see whether the gentleman from Illinois will come up and stand to that contract.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope you will give me as good a price as the other contractors—$159.

Mr. LETCHER. Is the gentleman going to back out? He does not mean to tell us that these horses are not worth $100, and then back out when he is offered a contract at that price.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I did not say that I would back out. But I say that it is fair I should get the contract at as good a price as the others.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; but you say that rate is too high; and you would not wish to cheat the Government? [Laughter.]

Now, let us look at another point in this connection! Take the other articles embraced in this contract. Here is cider-vinegar, first quality, at four and three quarter cents per gallon. Is that a plundering contract? Is refined white sugar at nine and a half cents per pound a plundering contract, delivered at St. Louis? So, I take it, with the article of sperm candles at twenty-four cents per pound. You and I, sir, know that we do not get them furnished for our families at that price, from our own market, in the city of Richmond. And yet this contract, thus made, is said to be an unreasonable and unfair contract, and imputations are cast on the Secretary of War in connection with it. Let me tell the gentleman from Illinois that, no matter who his informant may be, in operations of this sort the fang of slander will hurtless break on the adamant of the Secretary's reputation.

Well, my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] complained that we did not furnish information as to what part of these appropriations was an anticipation and what part a deficiency. Now, if the gentleman will take the trouble to make an examination, he will find in Miscellaneous Document No. 22 that the whole is there stated. He will find how much of it is anticipated and how much of it is for a deficiency. If he will go further he will find explanatory remarks. He will find something like the cost of furnishing these supplies to the Army, as estimated in the quartermaster general's department.

But, sir, these gentlemen say that the Secretary of War wants patronage. If so, had he not a fine opportunity to secure that patronage under this provision of the law, by going into these contracts and purchasing these supplies, that transportation might be carried on on Government account? He would have been in the market for forty thousand oxen. He would have been in the market for the hire of three thousand men. He would have been in the market for everything necessary to clothe and sustain the troops. And I submit to this House whether a privilege of this kind would not have been far more effective, and far more useful for the purpose of patronage and for his own advancement, than by the course which he saw fit to adopt? And suppose he had done it. Could he not have done it under the sanction of the law? Would he not have been authorized to do it under this section? I take it that he would.

But sir, my colleague [Mr. GARNETT] in his remarks of yesterday said, that he desired that we should come forward and introduce some measure which should take the power out of the hands of the Secretary of War now vested in him under the sixth section of the law of 1820; that he thought it was too great a power to give to one man, and he desired to see reform. Well, now, sir, let us see how that would work: the Army is in Utah; the appropriations have been exhausted, Congress will not meet for six months; their labors are done; the Army is ready to go home—but in order to get home, the Secretary of War must furnish supplies. How, in a case of that sort, could you secure the return of the Army if this law were repealed? They could not make a contract; they could not take a single step to secure the means necessary to bring the troops home, or to transfer them to any other post where their services might be needed. I take it that the Government would be in a very bad condition, and that it would be not a long time before the Army would go to pieces. No such law as my colleague desires to see pass would serve the necessities of the Government under such circumstances. I say, then, that so far as that law is concerned I regard it as a wise law, and not only shall I not introduce a proposition for its repeal, but I shall vote against any such proposition introduced by others. And how came that law upon our statute-book. I find, by going back to the debates at the time this bill was prepared, that it was prepared originally without the provision being inserted which vests in the Secretary of War the power of making these contracts under the contingencies which have been mentioned. On the suggestion of Mr. Williams, who had been engaged in the military service of the country, this provision was inserted upon the same ground which I have stated to-day. The necessity for it was such that it was introduced without opposition, and I think it is wise in us to allow it to remain there.

But, sir, I am not much surprised that gentlemen on the other side of the House should go against this bill. I know that some of them are not particularly partial to armies, in any way, of late years. It has not been long since these gentlemen defeated the regular appropriation bill for the Army, under the Pierce administration; but when they found that unless the Army was provided for, it would have to be disbanded, at the extra session they came back and surrendered gracefully.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. LETCHER. How did the bill pass, then? Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. By calling in your absentees.

Mr. LETCHER. I think, if you will examine the record, you will find that some of the gentlemen on the other side of the House changed their votes.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Not a man changed.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, as I understand, some gentlemen on the other side of the House deserved credit for having come in to the relief of the Army.

Mr. STANTON. Name one of them.

Mr. LETCHER. I mention Mr. MATTESON, of New York, for one.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Any others?

Mr. LETCHER. He is one, and I think I have heard of others. Well, now, sir, other members of the House object to this bill upon the ground that the money may, after all, not be used for the Utah expedition, and they would not vest in the President the power to use it there. They objected to the Army being used for the purpose of keeping the peace in Kansas, and now they object to its being used for suppressing outrages against the laws of the land. Sir, these gentlemen, many of them, have indorsed, by their votes in this House, the policy of the President in respect to Utah, who now say they will not allow the Army to go there. If these gentlemen do not intend to allow the President to carry out the policy he has marked out in reference to that Territory, why have they not before introduced a resolution directing the President to withdraw the army therefrom, and allow Brigham Young to have full possession of the Territory?

Now, sir, so far as I am concerned, I will not only vote for, but I will advocate the sending to Utah, a sufficient force to secure submission upon the part of these people to the legal authority of the country; and I have no sickly sympathy at all about what the army shall do when it gets there, if they do not submit. If they do not submit, I would do with them as Napoleon did with the mobs of Paris, direct the troops to fire ball-cartridges first, and blank cartridges afterwards. I would bring them to terms, and I would make them submit to the laws of the land. I hold that this Government is in honor bound to bring them to terms.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir; I cannot. If you will give me two or three hours you may ask me as many questions as you please.

I wish, in the few minutes I have left, to allude to another matter, which has been a good deal harped upon in the course of this debate, and that is the third section of the bill. Now, so far as that section, and the purpose for which it is proposed to appropriate the money under it, is concerned, I voted, I believe, against every solitary proposition covered by that section. I have usually voted against every proposition, as gentlemen know; but the House of Representatives chose to vote the money, to be paid out of the contingent fund. Did the House have a right to do it? If they did not have the right to do it, is it not most remarkable that the same thing should have been done for the last twelve years; and that during all that time, up to the incoming of Governor Cobb, it should have been recognized by the officers of the Government as legal? I say, is it not remarkable that objection should be taken now? When this extra compensation has been voted heretofore, where did the money come from to pay it? It must have been appropriated in some way to pay it, and where did it come from? Some appropriation bill placed it under the control of the contingent fund of the House. If there was no power to pay it out of the contingent fund, why was it not stopped? Why was it allowed to go on year after year?

But my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says that under that law of 1854 they had no authority to pay one cent of it. Let us see what the Comptroller of the Treasury has said in regard to this law of 1854—I refer to Mr. Whittlesey, the gentleman's beau ideal of a Comptroller. He refers to the subject on the sixth page of Miscellaneous Document No. 30, third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress. He goes on to refer to the adoption of the resolution of the 3d of August, 1854. The other resolution was adopted on the 29th of July, 1854. He says:

"This resolution of the House, (alluding to the resolution for extra compensation, passed on the 3d day of August, 1854,) is a contemporaneous construction of said joint resolution of July 29, 1854."

That was addressed to Mr. Guthrie, then Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to his inquiries on the subject. It was approved by Mr. Guthrie, and the money was paid under that recommendation, and yet we heard nothing in regard to that. How did it come? Could it have come in any other way than by a supply to the contingent fund of the House of the amount of money withdrawn by a subsequent legislative act on this subject? I take it that it could not. Then, we have this construction of the Government for a period of twelve years. I think myself that Governor Cobb's construction is right; but it has not been so considered by his predecessors; and one of my reasons for desiring to get rid of this matter is, that the probabilities are, if this provision shall not be adopted, that, sooner or later, it will end in a repeal of the act of 1845, and throw this matter entirely open. But these gentlemen say that they cannot vote a dollar for this purpose. Here is my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] who goes into heroics over it—the enormity of such a thing as this. Here are the gentlemen on the other side, who are greatly shocked at it. There is my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is terribly shocked; yet, Mr. Chairman, I believe he wanted extra pay for going to Kansas. There was a resolution of that sort proposed, but which was not received.

Taking these things altogether, are gentlemen to fight against this bill because every solitary provision cannot be made to square with their notions? I am perfectly willing to give them a vote on yeas and nays on that section, and let the House say whether it will strike it out or not. If they strike it out, let them take the balance of the bill, and so with any other provision. I am willing that they shall have a fair chance to express their opinion. If members are to wait here until they get a bill which, in every one of its provisions, harmonizes with their peculiar views, the probability is that you will never pass an appropriation bill for the support of the Government. There is not one of them that does not embrace a multitude of items of different sorts. All have to be considered; and if you are only to put into the bill such as will meet your approbation, or my approbation, the probability is that we will never get a bill that would receive more than thirty votes. I say that there is a wise rule on this subject which ought to be observed. We have just inaugurated a new Administration. I speak now to gentlemen on this side of the House. We all here in the Democratic ranks helped to put that Administration into power. It has just begun to develop its policy; and the question is whether, because you cannot make an appropriation bill harmonize exactly with all of your opinions, you are going to prevent that Administration from carrying out its policy in preserving the peace of the country, and securing obedience to the laws of the land? The wise rule is this: show by your votes that you are opposed to it; but if an appropriation is demanded for the execution of the laws, for the purpose of protecting life and liberty, and the rights of property, why then, if you have shown your hostility, is it not wise and proper to vote for what is absolutely required for the purposes of the Government in the execution of the law? Why, sir, just take a case which may readily occur. Here comes up a claim which you direct to be paid out by the Treasury Department, or under the supervision of the War Department; you appropriate the money in the bill, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of War, to pay the claim. You may not have approved the claim, yet it passed the House. Now will you deny the means by which that claim is to be satisfied? But gentlemen say there is the difference between the two, that this is a resolution of this House, payable out of its contingent fund, and the other is an act of Congress, regularly passed through both Houses and approved by the President. Does that make a difference? Does it make the slightest difference? Have you not pledged yourself, by your action, that you would pay this sum of money to these parties? Whether it is right or wrong is a matter which belongs to the past, and does not apply to the present; and whatever may be the opinion on the construction in regard to that matter, I am for acting on the present rules, and am for meeting what I consider this body honorably bound to meet.

There is another objection to this bill of my friend from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] He proposes to strike out the head of the appropriation for the payment of the furniture in the Speaker's room, for newspapers, &c. I have no objection to his striking out that head. I have no objection to make it applicable to this purpose, and this purpose alone; but in this connection there is one thing which has somewhat astonished me. Here is an appropriation of $200,000 for the purpose of paying for surveys of the public lands in California. The appropriation for this service, during the last year was $50,000, and yet the surveyor general has had labor done to the amount of $200,000. Why is not that assailed in the same way? Is not this Government, when they have got their surveys honestly made, bound to discharge the debt incurred thereby? We heard nothing about that. Take this matter in any point of view, look at it in any way, and we have done what was our duty—nothing more.

There is another item referred to by my friend from Alabama, which I acknowledge is not a deficiency, and ought not, perhaps, to have been in here, and that is, the appropriation for the reporters. It can be stricken out if the House so wills it.

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate has now closed, and the bill is open to amendments; upon which five minutes will be allowed for a speech in favor, and five minutes for a speech against them.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I wish to make a correction of a statement made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.]

Mr. SINGLETON. I object.

KANSAS BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will give notice, if there be no objection, that the Kansas bill will be voted on to-morrow at one o'clock.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to strike out lines fourteen and fifteen, as follows:

"For contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, viz:—"

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection to the striking out of those words.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move, pro forma, to strike out from the eighth to the fifteenth lines, for the purpose of correcting a statement made just now by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state, and hopes the statement will be heard by all the members of the committee, in order that nobody may be taken by surprise, that, according to the rules of the committee, when certain lines have been read and passed over, and subsequent amendments have come in, it is too late to go back and amend the former part of the bill. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will be received.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to going back. We can go back after we have got to the end of the bill. I want to offer an amendment to the fifteenth line.

The CHAIRMAN. The fourteenth and fifteenth lines have been stricken out.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I move to insert between the thirteenth and sixteenth lines the following:

For folding documents, including the pay of folders, wrapping paper, twine, and paste, $20,000.

I ask for the reading of the letter which I send up, which will explain the amendment.

The letter was read as follows:

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPS. UNITED STATES,
March 16, 1858.

SIR: Upon an examination of the bill reported by your committee to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the present fiscal year, I observe an omission of an appropriation for folding, folding paper, twine, &c., which was estimated for by this office.

I respectfully ask the insertion of an appropriation of $20,000 in the deficiency bill for the above object.

In explanation of the increase of this estimate, I would state that there is now on hand about $10,000 worth of folding paper and twine that has been paid for by the former Clerk, and has been rejected by the present Committee of Accounts, and cannot therefore be used in the folding-room. The expenses for labor done in the folding room are about $1,200 per month, making for five months $3,000, and for folding paper and envelopes for the same time, $14,000.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. C. ALLEN,

Clerk House of Representatives United States.
(Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means.)

Mr. HOUSTON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] or any other gentleman who knows anything on the subject, whether the appropriation for some of the items provided for in this amendment is not required, because the materials contracted for, twine and wrapping paper, were of a quality so inferior that they could not be used?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, I understand that to be the fact; but the late chairman of the Committee of Accounts [Mr. MASON] can give the gentleman any information he desires about it.

Mr. MASON. I do not understand that the Committee of Accounts directed the Clerk to throw away this old wrapping paper and twine. There was a question whether they were good or not, and we told him if they were not good to get some more. The twine is such twine as every gentleman has seen tied round the documents sent to his room, and can tell whether it is good or not. We told the Clerk if it was not strong enough to get some more.

Mr. LETCHER. I know nothing in relation to this matter, except what is contained in that letter. I understand that the Committee of Accounts refused to use this twine and paper because it was of inferior quality.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUFFIN] had particular charge of this matter, and I believe he thought it was not as good as it ought to be. I never examined it. The chief clerk came before the committee and said that it was inferior material, and we told him to buy more if it was not good enough.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "twenty" and inserting "ten." I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] to the statement which he made a few moments ago in relation to the Army bill, which passed at the second session of the last Congress.

Mr. FAULKNER. I call the gentleman to order. Remarks about the Army bill are not pertinent to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is aware that under the rules he is only entitled to explain his amendment to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I am aware of the rule, sir, but the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to correct him. He just said, in the course of his remarks, that gentlemen on this side of the House changed front on the Army bill, during the last Congress, and aided in its passage. Now, I have the yeas and nays on the passage of that bill before me; and I find that not one Republican voted for it; and Mr. MATTESON, to whom the gentleman alluded, is recorded as voting against it.

Mr. RUFFIN. I desire to say, in relation to this twine and paper, that at the commencement of the session, the documents folded in the folding-room were folded in paper which was entirely unfit for the purpose. I know that I received documents in my room that were folded in paper which was perfectly rotten, and unfit for the purpose for which it was intended. And the Committee of Accounts thought that it was very poor economy for the Government, after expending an immense amount in publishing books, some of which are worth several dollars a volume, to try and save two or three cents on the paper to envelop them, and have them folded in paper which would probably be worn off before they had traveled a hundred miles through the mails.

The Clerk was directed to get better paper, and the superintendent of the folding-room was directed not to use any paper that was not fit for the purposes intended. There was also some twine—I do not know what quantity—which was unfit for any purpose whatever. It was perfectly rotten. I tried some of it myself, to tie up bundles and speeches, and found it unfit for the purpose for which it was intended. These are the facts in regard to this matter. The last Clerk, or some one else, had taken certain materials for the folding-room, under contract, and some of them were so unfit that we directed that no such material should be used.

Mr. WALBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. LETCHER's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I submit the following amendment, to come in after line twenty-three:

For horses, carriages, and saddle-horses, $1,500.

Mr. LEITER. I propose to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question, whether this is a deficiency, and why there should be a deficiency in saddle-horses?

Mr. PHELPS. The letter of the Clerk will explain it.

It was read, as follows:

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 26, 1858.

SIR: In consequence of an under-estimate of my predecessor, Mr. Cullum, the appropriation made at the last session of the last Congress, for horses and carriages for the use of the House of Representatives, is exhausted. It will require the sum of $1,500 to cover the probable deficiency for the present fiscal year.

Very respectfully,
J. C. ALLEN,
Clerk House of Representatives United States.
Hon. J. GLANCY JONES,
Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to strike out from line twenty-four to line twenty-seven, inclusive, as follows:

To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the House for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress the usual additional compensation of $800 each, $1,000.

I make the motion in good faith, and have no argument to make.

Mr. WARREN. I am a little astonished that such a motion should emanate from the source from which it comes. The scriptural truth, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," applies to these reporters of this House preëminently. There are no persons in connection with this Congress, members, clerks, or other officers, who perform anything like the labor of these gentlemen. The task of the reporters is peculiarly an unenviable one, as I take it. They have to sit here from the opening till the close of the session, listening to the threats made against the Union; and not only that, they have to write down the infamous and vile slanders aimed at this Union.

Mr. COLFAX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question: whether he alludes to those threats made, that the Union would be dissolved unless a certain bill should be passed by this Congress?

Mr. WARREN. I allude to the threats that have been made from the commencement of this session up to this time. If I had time, I would tell the gentleman that I allude to the peculiar party with which the gentleman acts, and the members of which voted, a few days ago, against a law to protect the lives and property of honest citizens in the capital of this nation. I say that, while members may retire, and are not bound to listen to the assaults made upon the Union, the reporters are bound to keep their seats, and not only hear it, but write it all. I propose to say here, once for all, that, if gentlemen intend to be Democrats, it is time we were rallying around the Administration, instead of caviling at such just propositions as this. I suppose that, on this deficiency bill, nineteen out of every twenty members are prepared to take a leap in the dark; and many of them strike at the Administration without having investigated the thing for themselves.

Mr. HUGHES. I merely wish to state that my only object in offering this amendment was to give the gentleman from Arkansas an opportunity to make that speech; and now I want to withdraw it.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the part proposed to be stricken out by striking out the words "To enable John C. Rives." I think that language is founded upon the assumption that Mr. Rives is not able to pay his reporters. I do not want to make Mr. Rives the agent for paying money which the House voluntarily undertakes to pay.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. Mr. Rives now publishes the Globe, and we hold him responsible for the faithful performance of the duties of the reporters. In order to do that, he must pay the reporters and have control over them. And it is to carry out the same idea that this extra compensation to the reporters should be paid through him.

Mr. SEWARD. How is Mr. Rives made responsible by the payment of this extra compensation?

Mr. GROW. The House holds him responsible for a faithful report of its proceedings.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order for me to explain the object of my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is hardly in order for the gentleman now to explain his amendment.

Mr. GROW. I will explain to the gentleman from Georgia how the matter stands, as I understand it. The House commenced, the Congress before the last, if I am not mistaken, to pay extra compensation to the reporters. In order not to relieve Mr. Rives from the responsibility, they proposed to do it in this way. At the pay which Mr. Rives received at that time, he could not afford to pay them larger wages. The House thought it advisable to pay them additional compensation in this form, and leave Mr. Rives responsible for the faithful performance of their duties.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Will it be in order for me to move to reduce the amount?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be in order.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to reduce the amount $100.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the original proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] to strike out this whole item. The reporters of this House are paid under a contract with Mr. Rives. They are under his employ; and I hold if they are not paid enough, if Mr. Rives cannot employ them at the price which we pay for publishing the Globe, then we ought to increase the price we pay him sufficiently to enable him to make a contract with his employes and give them a fair compensation for their services. I hold that it is wrong to vote $4,000, or any other sum of money, to the reporters of this House, which is nothing more nor less than a mere bonus. We give them that in addition to the amount which they receive from Mr. Rives under their contract with him. I hold that it is wrong upon principle; and, for one, I will not vote this money in this way. Either employ the reporters directly, or else pay Mr. Rives sufficient to enable him to pay them for their services. This amendment is not a deficiency, as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia, who represents the Committee of Ways and Means in respect to this bill. It is not a deficiency at all, and therefore ought not originally to have been in the bill, and it ought not to be here now. It is wrong to appropriate the money, and I shall vote to strike out the whole item. I now ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GROW. I object. I concur with the gentleman from Kentucky in what he has said on the principle of voting extra compensation. I have generally voted against such resolutions. But you have given it to all the other employes of the House, and I ask if it is not right to give it to the reporters?

Mr. BURNETT. I propose to remedy the evil by not voting to appropriate a dollar to pay the extra compensation voted to either the reporters or any employes of the House.

Mr. GROW. This extra compensation has for two Congresses been paid to the reporters; and I think that if there are any persons in the service of the House, who are entitled to this compensation, it should be the reporters. They have more labor to perform, and labor more difficult to perform, than any other employes of the House. They have to work late at night, and sometimes all night, and ought to be paid well.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him one question? Are these reporters employes of the House, or are they employes of Mr. Rives?

Mr. GROW. It is for the very reason that they are employes of Mr. Rives that the appropriation is placed in its present phraseology. I ask the question, when you have paid extra compensation to all the other employes of the House, if it is not right to pay it to these reporters? If they are paid through Mr. Rives, as is provided in this bill, no one supposes that the money will not be faithfully paid to them.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that when a corps of reporters have performed their duties as I conceive this corps have performed them, with the ability, efficiency, and correctness which they have shown, it is not right that all the other employes of the House should be paid extra compensation, and they should be neglected.

Mr. BURNETT then, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to strike out "$800," and insert "$400."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his former amendment?

Mr. HUGHES. I propose to modify it as I have stated.

Mr. WARREN. I submit that it is not competent for the gentleman to make his modification. The gentleman moved to strike out the entire paragraph; and, having done it, the motion has been fully discussed in committee. I submit that he cannot now modify that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may modify his proposition by general consent.

Mr. WARREN. Well, sir, I object.

Mr. SEWARD. I have an amendment to offer in the twenty-third line, by way of perfecting the paragraph, before the vote is taken on the motion to strike it out. I submit the following amendment. Insert before the clause the following:

Upon the assumption that John C. Rives is insolvent, which is untrue in itself; and it being assumed, which is equally untrue, that the Government is incapable of discharging its own money; now, therefore,

Mr. LEITER. I rise to a point of order. This is a stump speech, and is not in order on this bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Whatever the Chair might think of the amendment, it is not for him to decide on that point.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be our legislation, I hold that it ought to be consistent with truth, and therefore I have moved this amendment, as explanatory of the character of this legislation. In the first place, I understand that Mr. Rives is able to pay all his liabilities; and in the second place, that we have a Treasury of the United States, and an officer to disburse the money which we may appropriate. It is not necessary that we should have a sub-treasurer in Mr. Rives, to disburse $4,000 which we propose to give to the reporters on our own responsibility. I ask any gentleman who votes against my proposition, what necessity there is in making Mr. Rives an agent to perform an act of charity which this House may undertake to perform? Why is not this House as well able to vote this money to the reporters themselves as through Mr. Rives?

Mr. NICHOLS. I will explain this. The House has contracted with Mr. Rives for publishing the Globe—

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I understand all of this contract business. I want to know whether it is embraced in Mr. Rives's contract that he shall disburse the charities of this body? What has Mr. Rives to do with this appropriation? The assertion, "to enable Mr. Rives" to pay these reporters, is not a truth. He is able to pay that amount, and when we vote in that language we vote in a falsehood. It should be to enable the Treasury of the United States to pay it, under the sanction of law, to these gentlemen.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. I cannot believe that the gentleman is serious in proposing it. It seems to have been customary to allow the official reporters of this House, at each session, the sum named in this bill. It has been introduced here in accordance with that usage of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. This is an enabling act, and I wish to know whether the gentleman is in favor of it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will state, in time, what I am in favor of. As I understand it, the sum has already been appropriated to pay the general sum allowed to the reporters, and as it has been usual to pay them this additional compensation, it comes here properly as a deficiency. The gentleman asks me whether I am in favor of an enabling act? I have suggested already to the gentleman from Virginia that it would be better to substitute for the words "to enable John C. Rives to pay to," the word "for." I am decidedly in favor of voting to provide for this deficiency in what it has been usual to appropriate for these reporters.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the gentleman to inform the committee how long it has been the practice of the House to allow this money to the reporters. Has it not been the practice for eight years?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I cannot speak from experience, but I understand that it has been the practice for that time. I say that this is the proper place for it; because, in making the appropriation for paying the reporters, there was omitted that which has been allowed them, in accordance with the practice of the House, for eight years; therefore, I am in favor of leaving this appropriation in the bill. It is a deficiency, and not an original appropriation. It is a deficiency, because, when the appropriation was made of the sum necessary to pay these reporters, this was omitted. I hope the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment, will be rejected.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The question recurred on the motion of Mr. HUGHES.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Virginia suggested that this might be struck out, so as to give us the yeas and nays in the House on striking it out.

[Several voices. No! No!]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. Mr. HUGHES. I demand tellers on my amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. COMINS and FLORENCE were appointed.

The amendment was rejected—ayes twenty-seven; nays not counted.

Mr. GARNETT. I offer the following amendment:

Resolved, That the bill be reported to the House with a recommendation to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in separate bills the items for deficiencies in the appropriations for each head of expenditure for the service of the present fiscal year, and in another bill all appropriations designed for the service of the next fiscal year, and also with instructions to inquire what further legislation is necessary to restore to Congress an efficient control over the expenses of the Government.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. That resolution is not submitted, as I understand, as an amendment. If it is, it is not germane to the matter under consideration.

Mr. GARNETT. I submit that such a resolution is always in order, because it is competent for the committee at any time to rise and report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Virginia that, under the rules of the House, it is not in order for the committee to rise and report the bill as long as an amendment is pending, or anybody proposes to offer an amendment. The Chair is therefore of opinion that the resolution is not in order until all amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HUGHES. I move now to amend the clause in relation to the Globe reporters, by striking out the words "four thousand dollars."

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. The question has been taken on the proposition to strike out the whole clause and it has failed. Prior to the submission of that motion it was in order to have perfected the clause proposed to be stricken out; but the question having been taken on the motion to strike out the entire clause, it is not in order to amend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Missouri, on the ground that the rule of the House says distinctly that a motion to strike out, being lost, shall not afterwards preclude other amendments to strike out, and to strike out and insert.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a question of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. It is the very same thing in its effect as the former amendment, to strike out the whole clause. The gentleman proposes now to strike out the whole amount proposed to be appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand it.

Mr. WARREN. I understand he proposes to strike out the $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. He proposes to strike out the $4,000, and leave the $800 standing.

Mr. WARREN. It is the same thing. The effect is the same. I speak of the effect, and I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact, that in the event this amendment prevails, there will be no appropriation left, and I take it you might as well strike out the entire clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect would be the same, but it is not for the Chair to judge of the effect of the amendment. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to offer it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a question of order. I understand that this amendment proposes to strike out the whole appropriation in the clause.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order for the committee to report the appropriation bill in blank.

Mr. HUGHES. When I first moved to strike out this entire section, I considered it unnecessary to submit any remarks; but the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] induce me to desire to submit one or two observations in reference to the principle involved in this proposed appropriation. My object in submitting the motion was to take such steps as I could towards attacking what I conceive to be the greatest obstruction to the public business and the greatest waste of the public money that exists under this Government. I refer to this whole system of official reporting. I believe, sir, that that system is the greatest obstruction to the public business, and the most unwarrantable expenditure of the public funds that is to be found under our whole system of Government. It gives rise to all these written essays that are not read here for the House but for that other tribunal to which most of the declamation delivered upon this floor is directed—"the country."

Mr. WARREN. I apprehend the gentleman does not allude to me when he speaks of "written essays," for no one ever heard of my reading a speech here.

Mr. HUGHES. I except the gentleman. Mr. WARREN. I am glad he does, for I always speak what I have to say.

Mr. HUGHES. I except the gentleman from these remarks. By the way, the gentleman says that he is surprised at the quarter from which the objection to this clause comes—surprised that it should come from a Democrat. I am surprised at him, that he should stand here and advocate an "enabling act."

Mr. QUITMAN. I call the gentleman from Indiana to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, sir, as gentlemen seem, to use language which was applied to me the other day, "rather prolific in questions of order," I will abandon the discussion, and take my seat.

Mr. HICKMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. This, sir, is not the time to object to the system, which has been for a long time pursued, of reporting the debates of this House. If the gentleman desires to make objection to it, it would come more properly at another time and under different circumstances. Now, sir, what is proposed in this clause of the bill has many considerations to recommend it. In the first place, it has usage. I understand from gentlemen who profess to have knowledge upon the subject, that this compensation has been allowed for the last eight years at least. In addition to that, the compensation paid by Mr. Rives to the reporters is known to be inadequate. I am informed that it has averaged from twelve to thirteen hundred dollars a year to each of the reporters. We know the amount of their labors, and the character of those labors. Now, sir, the Government will not save anything by striking this from the bill, for the simple reason that Mr. Rives, in making his contracts with the reporters, looks to this as a part of the compensation which is to be paid to them, and if it were stricken from the bill, the consequence would be that Mr. Rives himself would doubtless insist upon an increase of pay, for the purpose of making an increase of pay to his employes. We may as well, therefore, meet the question now as at any other time, and I regard the appropriation as eminently proper.

Mr. HUGHES's amendment was not agreed to. Mr. LOVEJOY. I move to amend by striking out the following portion of the bill:

For the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department, consisting of fuel for the officers, enlisted men, guard, hospitals, storehouses, and offices; forage in kind for the horses, mules, and oxen of the quartermasters' department at the several posts and stations, and with the armies in the field; for the horses of the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such companies of infantry as may be mounted, and for the authorized number of officers' horses when serving in the field and at the outposts; of straw for soldiers' bedding, and of stationery, including company and other blank books for the Army, certificates for discharged soldiers, blank forms for the pay and quartermaster's departments; and for the printing of division and department orders, Army regulations, and reports, $780,000.

For the purchase of horses for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such infantry as it may be found necessary to mount at the frontier posts, $250,000.

For the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, consisting of postage on letters and packages received and sent by officers of the Army on public service; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, including the additional compensation to judge advocates, recorders, members, and witnesses, while on that service, under the act of March 16, 1802; extra pay to soldiers employed under the direction of quartermaster's department, in the erection of barracks, quarters, storehouses, and hospitals, the construction of roads, and other constant labor, for periods not less than ten days, under the acts of March 2, 1819, and August 4, 1854, including those employed as clerks at division and department headquarters; expenses of expressmen to and from the frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to paymasters, other disbursing officers, and trains when military escorts cannot be furnished; expenses of the internment of non-commissioned officers and soldiers; authorized office furniture; hire of laborers in the quartermaster's department, including hire of interpreters, spies, and guides for the Army; compensation of clerk to officers of the quartermaster's department; compensation of forage and wagon masters, authorized by the act of July 5, 1838; for the apprehension of deserters, and the expenses incident to their pursuit; the following expenditures required for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, and such companies of infantry as may be mounted, viz., the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horse and mule shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing, hire of veterinary surgeons, medicines for horses and mules, picket ropes and shoeing the horses of those corps, $190,000.

For constructing barracks and other buildings at posts which it may be necessary to occupy during the year; and for repairing, altering, and enlarging buildings at the established posts, including hire or commutation of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops, of storehouses for the safe keeping of military stores, and of grounds for summer cantonments; for encampments and temporary frontier stations, $80,000.

For subsistence in kind, $1,220,000.
For surveys for military defenses, geographical explorations, and reconnoissances for military purposes, $5,000.

As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] made an allusion to the statement which I made on Friday last in reference to this bill, I wish to say that, in a casual conversation which I had on the steps of a hotel with a gentleman who represented himself as a contractor, he told me that he had, or was one of a party or firm who had, a contract such as I stated. My allusion to its being a private conversation, I supposed, was understood. I did not intend to convey any such idea, but it had a particular signification. It was not private, and yet I had no authority to use the name; and, indeed, it made no impression on my mind, except that I would like to know the facts; and I came immediately to the House, and introduced a resolution of inquiry, which was objected to.

Mr. LETCHER. By whom?

Mr. LOVEJOY. By gentlemen all around who vote with the Administration—by Mr. MAYNARD, and others whom I cannot call by name. The matter went on till the debate came up; and I stated distinctly the fact that I introduced the resolution, and that it was objected to; and I had to blunder on in the dark the best way I could.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will permit me to state that I objected to the form of the resolution, not to the substance.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The why or wherefore is no matter. I state the fact simply to show my connection with this. I did not choose to give the name, because I had no authority to do so; although there was nothing private, either express or implied, in relation to it.

And now, in regard to the correctness of the statement. The statement in regard to the horses has proved to be true—that just such a contract has been made; and, as I understand, in the way stated, by an order going out from the quartermaster's department to make contracts with A, B, and C, and to give them so much per head. There is no evidence here that just such an order has not gone out for the contract for corn at ninety-eight cents, to be given to certain parties. I grant you that no such contract has been returned. I, of course, am bound to believe, and do believe, that no such contract has been sent to the department. But I did not understand the ropes sufficiently well to inquire whether an order of that kind had been issued; so that by-and-by there may be a report of the contract made as stated. I do not know that it is so. I do not know that it is not so. But I know this, that the statement in reference to the horses has proved correct, and that the statement in reference to the mode in which the contracts are made has proved correct; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] who interrupted me, was kind enough to correct himself since. I need not make any remark in regard to that.

Now, in regard to these returns: we ask for the contracts, and they send in a statement here which answers the demand of the resolution about as well as the return of a skeleton would answer the demand for the man. It may be very good as a study of comparative anatomy, but it does not answer the demand, and is not the contract. But there is sent in an old dead contract which is stated to be annulled, and I presume it is.

The contract of the 22d of March, with Armistead and Reid, is annulled. Who cares anything about those annulled contracts? We want the living contracts. The contractors said that the spring was so backward they could not get the cattle there; and so the contract was extended. A very backward spring this, everybody knows! Remarkably so! And they sent in a piteous, plaintive cry to the Secretary of War: "Extend this contract for the delivery of that which we are to deliver at Fort Laramie."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. This five-minute rule is a very short allowance, but I think it is long enough for me to reply to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Has the gentleman the right to speak again, under the rule?

Mr. LETCHER. I expect he has.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Because, if he has not, I object. He did not let me answer him.

Mr. LETCHER. I agreed to place myself, if my time was extended, in a position to be inter-gated by every one of the two hundred and thirty-two members of the House.

Now, all I desire to say is this. As I understood the latter part of the gentleman's remarks, he was complaining, not that a contract for cattle was made, but that the Secretary of War released a man from the contract because he could not get to the place in time to deliver the cattle.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope the gentleman does not find fault with what I was saying, when I was cut off right in the middle.

Mr. LETCHER. No; I do not find fault with it. Mr. LOVEJOY. You must take the whole of it.

Mr. LETCHER. But, I say this—and I leave the House to judge whether the fact is not as I state—that under a contract to deliver cattle at six dollars a hundred net, at Fort Leavenworth, $7 50 at Fort Laramie, six hundred miles further, and $10 50 at Utah, twelve hundred miles further, any man who knows anything of the price of beef must come to the conclusion that this contract would have been an immense loss to the party that made it. He might, perhaps, have saved himself in the delivery at Fort Leavenworth, where the distance for transportation is short, but he would have incurred immense loss by the delivery at Fort Laramie at $1 50 more, and at Utah at $4 50 more.

Now, in regard to this other matter. The Secretary of War reports the fact that the quartermaster and the party with whom he was alleged to have made the contract for the sale of corn at St. Louis, disagreed in regard to the price, and that, in consequence of that disagreement, no contract was made.

As to the other matter on which the gentleman made a point in his remarks—he says that when he proposed to introduce his resolution of inquiry, it was objected to. I was not aware till now by whom objection was made; but I am certain that I did not object to it. But besides, when that resolution was introduced on Monday, no objection was made to it. The answer came in promptly at the meeting of the House on Tuesday. I do not see that there has been any attempt at concealment, or that anything has been attempted to be covered up in connection with this matter; and so far as I can judge from the papers presented, and from anything that I know in private conversation, I take this occasion to say here that the conduct of the War Department has been fair, manly, and above-board. I have seen no disposition to withhold information from the gentleman from Illinois, or any other person applying for it. The gentleman himself must say that there was no attempt to cover anything up, but that he got what he applied for.

Mr. QUITMAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the ninetieth line:

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That to meet the extraordinary expenses growing out of the expedition to Utah, which have been incurred and may still occur before the termination of the present fiscal year, the sum of $5,400,000 be appropriated for the following purposes:

My object, Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment, is to express my views upon the subject covered by it. I have looked upon this bill with some degree of suspicion. I have always felt a disposition to discourage bills to provide for deficiencies; and it is only in consideration of the emergency in which the country now stands that I have come to the conclusion to vote for this item of deficiency in reference to the Army, and I have little doubt, if this bill were resolved into its separate elements, and the different elements brought in as separate bills, very few gentlemen would be found voting against it. The bill, it is true, is not exclusively for supplying deficiencies in the appropriations for the year ending on the 30th of June next. As such it is defective, and its title does not express the objects covered by the bill. But, sir, a great part of the appropriations contained in this bill for the Army expenses are to meet deficiencies for the Utah expedition, which could not have been foreseen when the estimates for the present fiscal year were made out; and they are to meet an emergency which, as the gentleman from the Committee of Ways and Means who has charge of this bill has stated, no man who appreciates properly his duty to his country can possibly avoid.

How could the President and Secretary of War, after having determined upon their course of action, have done otherwise than incur these expenses? From what I have heard, there is not a single contract which looks to me extravagant. There may be; I do not speak definitely, for I am not informed upon the subject, otherwise than from the documents which have been sent to the House. But so far as I have been able to judge from the information before us, (and I have examined it with some care,) I see nothing reprehensible upon the part of the Secretary of War. It was his duty to make contracts for those provisions in advance. Colonel Johnston informs us that he has not provisions to last beyond the 1st of May. It was not to be expected, when the expenses were so heavy, that any contractor, without means provided by the Government, could provide himself with the wagons necessary for transportation in advance.

Then with these extraordinary causes producing the necessity which exists for these appropriations, if the House intends to sustain the policy of the President—and it has already voted to sustain that policy by voting additional regiments of troops for the Utah service—it is bound to vote the appropriations contained in this bill.

Mr. QUITMAN then, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. I move, in line one hundred and thirteen, to amend, by reducing the appropriation to $3,000,000. It strikes me as singular, that when these large appropriations are asked for by the Administration, none of their authorized exponents on this floor have seen fit to inform us whether this is a warlike or peaceful expedition to the Territory of Utah. Is Utah in a state of rebellion? Is it in a state of war? The Government should inform us whether it is or not. Long since, this House sent a resolution upon this subject to the Committee on Territories, headed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] the political leader of that side of the House, yet we have received no report from them, and no further information from the Executive.

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who has charge of this bill, another question. The latest advices from California give information that a son of the late Judge Kane, of Philadelphia, was at San Bernardino, in the southern part of California; that he stated that he was an agent of the Administration, with official dispatches for the Governor of Utah, and offering $1,500 to any one who would take him to Salt Lake City within a certain number of days.

Whether the statement is true or false, I do not know. I know he is the son of a gentleman who was, in his lifetime, one of the most decided friends of the Administration in the State of Pennsylvania, the late United States Judge Kane. As the gentleman from Virginia stands in this House, upon this bill, in the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the British Parliament, to obtain the money necessary for the use of the Government, and is supposed to know the views of the Administration he represents, I desire to know if he has been apprised of any private dispatches having been sent to the Governor of Utah? I wish to know if the Administration has sent a messenger to enter there by the back door with one kind of a message, while they ask us to vote eight or ten millions to enable the troops to enter at the front door with another ostensible object? If they are making any attempt to come to an arrangement by this back-door process, it is but right Congress should know it. It is true, they have a precedent for such a proceeding in a former Administration, of which the present Executive was a Cabinet minister, which, while they sent an army and fleet to enter Mexico at the front door, sent a pass to Santa Anna, through the fleet which blocked the coast, to let him out at the back door. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he is aware of any private dispatches by the Administration, by which they are carrying on a negotiation with the Mormons through a private arrangement, while they are asking us to make these extraordinary appropriations?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know whether any dispatches have been sent to the Governor of Utah. I have not heard of it before now; nor did I know that Mr. Kane, or anybody else, had carried any dispatches there.

I will call the gentleman's attention to a little matter which will preclude the necessity of my saying anything more. I find that the gentleman voted for this preamble on the 23d day of December, 1857:

"Whereas, it appears from the proclamation of Brigham Young, late Governor of the Territory of Utah, from the President's message, and from later developments, that that Territory is now in open rebellion against the Government of the United States," &c.

The gentleman must have had some reason for the vote he gave at that time; and there was a separate vote on the adoption of that preamble by yeas and nays. The President had so reported the fact here; the House so voted; and it seems to me that, as it was so adopted with the gentleman's concurrence, he ought to be now satisfied that there is rebellion there.

Mr. COLFAX. I withdraw my amendment, and move another, reducing the appropriation to $2,000,000.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to state that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this House is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] and not the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to say that when the Administration, or the Committee of Ways and Means, selects any gentleman here to represent the Administration on a money bill, as they have the gentleman from Virginia in this case, I regard him pro tempore in the same official position towards this House as the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the British Parliament, when asking appropriations for support of his administration.

Let me answer the gentleman from Virginia on another point. I voted for that preamble to the resolution of reference to the Committee on Territories. That was in December; and yet, here in April, although they have a majority of two to one on the committee to which it was referred for action, they have not seen fit to report their views on the question involved, or to tell us whether the Delegate from Utah represents a Territory in open rebellion, and is entitled to a seat on this floor. Why this suppression, this stifling of the matter in the committee-room? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is the political leader of that side of the House, and he, as chairman of that committee, had power to make a report on this question at any day, or any hour of the day, for it is a privileged question.

Mr. LETCHER. I cannot tell what the Committee on Territories are about, or why they have not reported. It is a matter I had nothing to do with. My business was to prepare this bill, or to aid in its preparation, to bring it into the House, and, believing it to be right, to vote for its passage. If the gentleman from Indiana will call on the chairman of the Committee on Territories, or any one of its members, he may obtain the information which he seeks. Not expecting to be called upon as to the action of other committees, I have not posted myself on those matters.

Mr. HUGHES. As a member of the Committee on Territories, I should like to answer the gentleman's inquiries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to make a speech of five minutes, in answer.

Mr. MORGAN. Was not the amendment opposed by the gentleman from Virginia?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana yielded the floor to the gentleman from Virginia, to answer a question.

Mr. HUGHES. The inquiry which my colleague has asked with such an air of triumph was predicated on a misstatement of facts in the case. My colleague states that this House has sent to the Committee on Territories an inquiry as to whether the Territory of Utah is in rebellion or not. That is not so. This House has voted that that Territory was in a state of rebellion; and that gentleman from Indiana voted for it, and spoke in favor of it, and regretted the necessity which rested upon him, on that occasion, to differ from his great leaders, the late member from Massachusetts, Mr. Banks, and some others. The inquiry which was referred to that committee was, as to whether the Delegate from Utah, being the representative of a Territory now in a state of rebellion, had a right to hold a seat upon this floor. That was the inquiry; and it was an inquiry concerning a matter of law, and not a matter of fact; and, in the gentleman and his associates and confederates had permitted this House to pass to the legitimate subjects of legislation, and had not continually occupied its attention with the everlasting question of Kansas, the Committee on Territories would have answered that inquiry long ago.

Mr. COLFAX. I will ask my colleague a question. I would like to know how many speeches he has made on Kansas, and whether he was not about the first one to open the ball? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. I was not the first one that took the floor. The first one was the little giant from the State of Ohio, [Mr. COX,] who spoke an hour on the other side. I occupied some fifteen minutes in answer to him. Week after week was taken up by the other side of the House, my colleague among the number. I occupied my hour in the Committee of the Whole the night before the final vote was taken, and after almost every other gentleman had spoken. If that gentleman wants to be instructed on the Kansas question, and will faithfully attend to my speeches, I will promise to make a convert of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLFAX. I have great respect for the ability of my colleague, but I will inform him that he might as well save his labor, if he means to make a convert of me.

Mr. HUGHES. Why, sir, it has been done already; for, a short time ago, the gentleman declared upon this floor that he would not vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, or any slavery constitution, if her whole people desired it; yet a few days ago he recorded his vote in favor of that measure; and I take to myself the credit of having converted him. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to reduce the appropriation from "$5,000,000," to "$3,000,000."

Mr. GREENWOOD. Inasmuch as remarks have been made foreign to the pending amendments, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that gentlemen are required by the rule to speak to their amendments, and I shall insist upon the enforcement of that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be expected to confine their remarks to explanations of or opposition to amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand that this bill, so far as it relates to the appropriations for the Army is predicated upon the hypothesis that Congress would carry out the recommendation of the President of the United States for an increase of the Army, or of the military force of the country, by adding at least five regiments to the military power of the country. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia if that be so or not?

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The gentleman says it is not. I had that impression, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that it is very strange that the Administration should not have asked for supplies, and for the means of supporting the Army which they had declared to us was absolutely necessary to be raised. But it seems that when they were saying to Congress that it was necessary to increase the Army, or the military force of the country, and were also bringing in a deficiency bill which it was supposed would cover all the deficiencies of that branch of the public service until next July, they made no provision whatever for this increased expenditure. That, I suppose, is a specimen of the wisdom and prudence with which affairs are conducted by the present Administration.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, and I shall be obliged reluctantly to vote against it; for the reason that it contains these provisions for the Army. We are told that this increase of expenditures has been occasioned in consequence of the difficulties in Utah. Now, sir, I hold that the President had no authority of law, not the slightest, to use the Army for the purposes for which he has used it in Utah. I challenge gentlemen upon the other side to show me the slightest authority of law for the President to make that use of the Army which has occasioned the necessity for this large increase in the expenditures of this branch of the Government? There is no such authority. And, sir, I wish to say to the committee, and to the country, that I will not vote to justify the President in thus usurping powers that did not belong to him. Nor can I see how any gentlemen can vote for this appropriation for the payment of expenses rendered necessary by the usurpation of the President.

Mr. LETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Has the gentleman a right to speak again?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir; I have a chance upon every new amendment. I am sorry that the gentleman from Illinois seems to be so much disturbed about me. I think I am one of the best-tempered fellows in the world, and I do not mean to do him any harm. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] says that the President has exercised power and authority not warranted by law, and that no man can vote for this bill without giving a direct sanction to that illegal exercise of power. Now, sir, if the President has exercised unlawful powers, what is the duty of this House? Was it not the province of that gentleman and the duty of that gentleman, and of others who entertain the same opinion, to institute the necessary proceedings here to test that question, and to bring the President up for punishment for violating the laws of the land? Why is it that four months of the session have rolled away, and we hear now, for the first time, of this exercise of illegal powers, when an appropriation bill comes up, not to support the President, but to support the Army, which is in the wilds between here and Utah, to furnish to them bread, and to give them the means of subsistence? Sir, it strikes me, that before the President should be arraigned here, we should have some act going to show that gentlemen's practice corresponds with their preaching. If the President has done an illegal act, punish him for it, or take steps to do it. But, instead of that, what do we find here? We find gentlemen not only not punishing him, but absolutely sustaining him, that they are voting him men—two additional regiments—in order that the power to conduct this campaign against Utah may be increased and rendered more efficient. Why was his course indorsed by both Houses of Congress, as it has been within the last day or two? The matter was as well understood then as it is now. If this usurpation has been committed, it was known then as well as it is known now. It seems to me, then, that the gentleman from Maine is rather too late in the day; and if I thought as he thinks, I should introduce a resolution here proposing to inquire into the matter, and, if the Army has been improperly sent there, demanding that it shall be recalled, and ordered to more suitable positions.

Mr. WASHBURN's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out from the point which we have now reached in the bill down to the close of the Army appropriations.

Sir, the bill under consideration is a bill to raise a large sum of money to pay off deficiencies in past appropriations. If we are to make up deficiencies where expenditures overrun appropriations we should first be very particularly informed in regard to the specific items of the defalcation, and why it happened. We have had no such information. The absence of this has been very well adverted to by several gentlemen on this floor; and therefore I shall only allude to it, as this is alone a sufficient cause of opposition to the passage of this bill. I say this alone is a conclusive objection to this bill. But, sir, I have other objections to its passage. The reasons so ably and clearly set forth by the honorable gentleman from Louisiana are of a still more important character. Sir, I hold in my hand the National Intelligencer of yesterday, containing a brief synopsis of the remarks of the honorable gentleman of Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] and I wish to call the attention of the committee to them. I am delighted to see that a gentleman so distinguished for his high legal attainments, a member of the Administration side of this House, a member of the Judiciary Committee, rises above party, and places himself on the true constitutional ground; and I take great pleasure in saying that I agree to every word he said, and feel confident that such sentiments will meet the approval of my constituents.

"Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, objected to the bill as involving a principle which would lay the foundation of unnumbered evils. It was the duty of Congress to fill the public Treasury, and to make appropriations therefrom for objects of public policy. It was the duty of the Executive to expend the appropriations for carrying out these objects. But when the appropriation was exhausted it was incompatible with the genius of republican institutions for the Executive to go on expending money. If the appropriation failed, or any other important emergency arose, it became the duty of the Executive to call Congress together to meet the emergency. This deficiency bill provided for a totally different course. The President had a right to make use of all military means at his disposal to repel invasion, but he had no right to undertake great military movements where no such emergency existed on his open motion and without consulting the legislative branch of the Government. To prevent Executive assumptions of power he was disposed to vote against this bill. Nothing had transpired in Utah calling for hot and hasty action; nothing to prevent the President from waiting for the meeting of Congress."

I say that this call is made on us with a design to use it for other purposes than for those set forth in the bill. It is not for deficiencies, but to be used by the President to carry on a formidable and very expensive military enterprise on his own assumed and unlawful authority, without the consent of Congress, to whom he should have submitted the question, and by whose decision he should have been governed. The President's conduct is very strange, and in my opinion very reprehensible. Without consulting Congress, he has led the nation into a far-distant and very expensive war—a war, the very commencement of which has beggared the Treasury. He is now prosecuting that war on his own authority, in a remote Territory of this Republic, and advising with us only to call for money. He is making extensive and wasteful contracts to prosecute that war on a large scale, without a dollar on hand to pay with, every cent of which must be on borrowed capital, laying the foundation of a national debt, almost beyond the hope of redemption. Why, what is he about to do? Concentrating an army of six thousand men, infantry, artillery, and horse, with all the countless paraphernalia and circumstance of war, two thousand miles from home, and through an unpeopled desert of fifteen hundred miles, at a cost never before heard of; and all present and future supplies to be dragged the whole distance by land. Flour, as near as can be found, costs some seventy or one hundred dollars a barrel, and everything else in proportion. And now, sir, he comes to us, and demands some ten million dollars, out of a bankrupt Treasury to begin with, and under the following pretence. Here, sir, is the title and the first section of the bill:

"A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely,"

Sir, is not this an attempt to obtain our money under false pretences?

Sir, there never was an Administration so utterly befogged in regard to its financial affairs as ours. Why, sir, scarce ninety days ago, buying up its own paper and paying a premium of some twenty per cent., and for paper not due for twenty years to come; and now so soon making a raise by selling its own notes in market to anybody who will purchase, to keep soul and body together, and now, again asks us to pay up deficiencies, which, if they existed at all, were in existence at the time of paying the twenty per cent. premium on its own debts, due some fifteen or twenty years ahead. Sir, did you ever hear the like? Suppose an individual who had a fine estate should do so, would not his family ask to have a guardian placed over him to save their inheritance?

Why, the President begins on a scale that will soon run up to $100,000,000, and without any necessity, and without the first attempt to avoid the conflict. Why has he not long ago sent able and discreet commissioners to the seat of disagreement to find out and settle the difficulty before he resorts to a war on usurped authority, and one the most remote and wasteful ever heard of? I am satisfied three men might be selected and sent there that would settle all the trouble in three days, and that General Scott, if he was there, would end the matter without firing a gun. Sir, it is all wrong and unnecessary from the beginning. He ought not to have done it. He had no right to do it. If he was of opinion it was necessary, he should have laid it before Congress and let them decide. It was a grave matter, and for them to decide and not for him. It was for him to execute if Congress so directed. He is the Executive, not the legislature. He has usurped a power not his own; and he seems to think, as Louis XIV said, "I am the State!" Sir, we must put an end to this Executive encroachment and save the Republic from the danger of what our fathers most dreaded; the consolidation of the central power. Sir, Congress must take care of the Treasury or we will soon have a debt that never will be paid. Are you aware, sir, where we are now rapidly drifting? Are you aware at this time, this very year of our Lord, 1858, from the beginning to the end of that year, our national debt is growing at the rate of $100,000 a day, Sundays and all?

Let the President have his way, and very soon we will have a debt the interest of which will consume every dollar of our revenue; and then what is to be done to support Government? Keep borrowing? No, sir; if you do you will never pay; and it will only sink you deeper and deeper. Resort to direct taxation? Impossible. For when the people know, as soon they will, that all this load was placed on their back for them to carry by the mal-administration of Government, and could and should have been avoided, they will denounce their Government, and refuse to pay. They must refuse, and they will refuse, for to pay will be impossible. Ohio would have eight millions, and New York ten millions, to pay annually by direct taxation, and it would be out of the question. It never can be done. And what then? "Then comes the end." The experiment is tried, and our boasted Republic—the pride of the earth, and the hope of the great and good of all climes—will come to an end, and find a premature grave. Sir, it is clearly the duty of this Congress to lay aside their party struggles, and come to the rescue. The country and the Constitution demand it. They, the Representatives of the people, the "Commons" of the country, and they alone, have power to hold the Executive in check. They can withhold appropriations; and now is the time to do it. Let us unite on this important duty, and it will do more than anything else to quench the fires of bitter, malignant, and dangerous sectional strife; yes, sir, more than anything else.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] suggested, ironically, the remedy of impeachment, and said, "Why do you not impeach the President?" I thought of that myself; and I can assure the honorable gentleman from Virginia that there is more truth than poetry in his suggestion. True, sir, impeachment would be resorted to as the most important and effectual remedy but for the presence of the demon, party, who stands here with his cloven foot and pitchforks to defend and protect the guilty. Sir, there never was a fairer candidate for impeachment, and for more than one specification that we can produce. In the purer days of the Republic, no Congress would have submitted to what we have.

[A portion of the foregoing remarks of Mr. GRANGER were made at a subsequent period in the day, the gentleman's five minutes having expired before he had completed them.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish now to complete my statement in regard to these contracts. I understand that these gentlemen—Messrs. Reed & Armistead, I believe—are men of abundant wealth, and they come in now and plead that they are not able to fulfill the contract which they made with the Government for furnishing beef.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I call the gentleman to order. He is not opposing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois must confine his remarks to opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] has encroached upon my amendment, and therefore I oppose it. He moved to strike out a part of these Army appropriations, and I moved to strike out the whole of them.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Would it be in order to ask the gentleman from Illinois to read the balance of the speech of the gentleman from New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but I am quite as competent to make my own speeches as the gentleman from New York is to make his; at least I think so.

These beef contractors, who have abundant wealth, as I am informed, and verily believe, sent in a petition to the Secretary of War requesting that the contract which they had entered into should be canceled, because it was going to ruin them, and for the reason that they could not buy at the low prices at which they were obliged to buy on credit. And the dealers around the country, knowing that they had taken a contract at such ruinous prices, would not trust them, because they expected they would fail. That is the reason assigned. In the first place, the Secretary of War gave an extension of the contract, and then, at the request of the parties, he canceled it; and then what turns up? This same contractor for the transportation enters into a contract to deliver, instead of young steers, as Armistead and Reed were to deliver, the oxen of the train with which the supplies are to be taken to Utah, and they are to deliver them at $7 50 per hundred net. I want that fact to be known to the House. These contractors get five dollars a day for every two yokes and the teamster while the oxen are detained, while they are getting fat on the grass, and while the teamster is lolling around watching them; and then they get $7 50 per hundred net for these train oxen when delivered. Now, if that is all right and fair, I am glad of it.

One single word more. The gentleman proposes to give me a contract for horses. I want the gentleman to give me a contract for the war. Just let me have control of the Government for three months at one time of what it costs, and I will get responsible parties to do all the fighting, and to fix it all up; just tell what you want done. If you want to have Brigham Young hanged, very good, we will hang him; if you want so many killed, say the word, we will kill them; if you want a certain law obeyed, enact the law, and we will enter into a contract to bring them to obedience.

Mr. LETCHER. I did not know that the gentleman from Illinois was a fighting man, or probably the Secretary might have spoken to him on the subject.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I presume I am as able to fight as the gentleman. But another point. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that this item covers a period of twenty months. How is that, when this is for the year ending June, 1858?

Mr. LETCHER. That is the title; but if the gentleman wants an amendment to suit his notions, he had better wait till we arrive at that point.

Mr. GRANGER asked leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS objected.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to amend by reducing this item from $5,400,000 to $2,700,000.

I submit this amendment in good faith. I am not, as the gentleman from Virginia attempted to prove a little while ago, opposed to furnishing supplies to the Army; but I am in favor of limiting them to the exact terms of the bill reported by the financial committee of this House. The Committee of Ways and Means in the very beginning of the bill declared that "the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858," and yet they now acknowledge, in the very teeth of that, that instead of this being to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June, 1858, it is to furnish supplies to be used during the whole of the succeeding year.

But, sir, when, in the Government organ published in the city of Washington—the Union—speaking about this subject of Army appropriations, the Republican members of the last House of Representatives, who voted liberally for the appropriations asked for by those at the head of affairs, have been arraigned and held responsible for having voted these appropriations, I, for one, am determined, when appropriations come before me hereafter for my vote, that I shall secure them in the shape which I think just, economical, and proper, or else purge myself from liability to such attacks hereafter by voting against them. Speaking of the appropriation of $19,000,000 for the expiring fiscal year, the organ says:

"If it were a fact that the Army appropriations were upwards of nineteen millions for the expiring fiscal year, the responsibility would belong as fully to the Black Republican House which voted them as to the Democratic Senate that concurred in and the Democratic Administration that administered them."

And again, for the third time in the article, it says:

"And that they are expenditures which have been authorized by a Black Republican House of Representatives."

Thus, when we vote against the appropriations because we think they are extravagant, and because the rejection of these bills is the only way in which we can infuse economy into the public service, we are denounced for stopping the wheels of Government; and when we vote what our rulers ask us to vote, we are held up before the country as responsible for extravagance.

Sir, I desire to have appropriation bills cut down to the smallest possible figures consistent with the efficiency of the public service. When this bill is trimmed down, so as to make it what it professes to be, a deficiency bill for the year ending June 30, 1858, I will be willing cheerfully to vote for it, and not before.

A single word now, in reply to my colleague, [Mr. HUGHES,] as I could not obtain the floor on the conclusion of his remarks: I have never voted for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. I voted for the admission of Kansas without any constitution, as Ohio was admitted, and to refer that instrument to the vote of her people, under the assurance—as the Union itself declares—that they will be certain to vote it down. I first voted to reject, not to ratify it—and the Crittenden amendment, for which I voted, was declared by the Union, previous to its passage, to be "as full of Black Republicanism as an egg is of meat." I only allude to this to clear up the point between my colleague and myself.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the gentleman from Indiana is willing to vote these supplies, the language of the first section of the bill need not embarrass him at all. I understand his objection to be that the bill declares that "the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858," and that there is something to be bought with the money here appropriated, which is to be used after the present fiscal year expires.

Mr. COLFAX. Yes; it is prospective, instead of being a deficiency bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, does the gentleman understand that when an appropriation is made for a fiscal year, the supplies and articles must be used in that year? Has such an interpretation ever been given? Such is not my construction; if my understanding is right, it is intended to expend the money in this fiscal year; but some of the supplies may be used subsequently; but it may very well be that a portion of it will not be required to be used till 1859; and I believe that the Secretary of War, or the Quartermaster General, speaks of a portion of it not being used till 1860.

Now, if the gentleman from Indiana is willing to adopt that construction, which I apprehend is the only reasonable one, his objection must fall to the ground. Would any gentleman rise on this floor and assert that the money appropriated for a given year must be used within that year; that that which is bought with the money must be used within that year? And yet that is the narrow construction which the gentleman gives it.

Mr. GROW. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes; although he did not allow me to interrupt him the other day.

Mr. GROW. The construction which my colleague gives is, I think, right; but your executive officers do not give the law that construction, for the Secretary of the Treasury takes the money appropriated for one year and applies it to another year.

Mr. PHILLIPS. My colleague says that my construction is right. He is but returning the compliment, for I indorsed him a few days since. But, if my construction is right, the gentleman from Indiana, who gives it a different construction from that of my colleague, must be wrong. If, therefore, he has no other objection, I hope he will reconsider his course and acquiesce in the construction of my colleague. I hope he will have no further difficulty in the way of voting for this bill.

The question was taken on Mr. COLFAX's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to offer an amendment to come in in the one hundred and eighteenth line. I move to insert the following:

For services of a keeper of the armory of the District militia, $300. And it is hereby provided, That this compensation shall be at the rate of $1,200 per annum.

I send up a letter from the Secretary of War, which will explain the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Is it in order to fix the compensation of an officer in an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I will then leave off that portion of it which fixes his compensation, and leave simply the appropriation of $300 for his services already performed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there any law authorizing the appropriation of this money?

Mr. LETCHER. I imagine that, when the Government build an armory, they intend to make provision for taking care of it. The Government have built an armory for the militia of this District. It was completed some months ago, and there was no man to take care of it. The Secretary of War appointed a man to take care of it until Congress should provide; and this $300 is to pay for his services.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that the amendment is not in order. If the Secretary of War had authority to make the appointment, he must provide for his payment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. How does the Chair decide the question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that, inasmuch as there is no law authorizing the appointment of this officer, the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the officer? I do not understand that this provides for the appointment of any officer.

Mr. LETCHER. It is merely to pay a man for taking care of the armory which you have built.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then this is to pay for services rendered, and not for the creation of an office.

The CHAIRMAN. If this office is one naturally arising in the War Department, the Secretary of War can apply other moneys to pay for it.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to submit this question for the decision of the Chair: whether this is not one of the contingencies of the Government? It is not to be supposed the Government would provide for the erection of a public building unless there was to be some one to take care of it, and it is, therefore, incumbent upon Congress to provide compensation for taking care of such building. The 81st rule makes it proper to report in appropriation bills not only such appropriations as are directly provided for by law, but such as are necessary contingencies for carrying on the Government. I read the 81st rule:

"81. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—September 14, 1837—unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government—March 13, 1838."

I submit, therefore, that it being necessary—the Government having erected a building—to provide for the taking care of it, this is one of the contingencies contemplated in the latter clause of the rule.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This would amount to the creation of a new office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could hardly hold that the management of the armory for the militia for the District was a contingency necessary for carrying on the War Department. The Chair understands the phrase "contingencies," in the rule read by the gentleman, to be intended in its technical sense.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It is a building erected by the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But it is for the service of the District, and not for the Government at all.

Mr. GARNETT. I offer the following, to come in at the end of line one hundred and eighteen:

No contract shall hereafter be made by any department of Government, except under a law authorizing the same, and under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, and excepting also contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army and Navy, and contracts in time of war by the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I submit that that amendment changes the existing law, and is, therefore, not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. GARNETT. I would inquire if it has not been the practice for the last ten years to put into appropriation bills amendments containing as much legislation as this?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes it has been the practice, but such provisions have been put in by the Senate or by unanimous consent in the House. The point being made, the Chair feels bound to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to strike out the following:

"For surveying the public lands and private land claims in California, including office expenses incident to the survey of claims, and to be disbursed at the rates prescribed by law for the different kinds of work, being the amount of surveying liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857, over and above that authorized under the appropriation of $50,000 for that period, $220,000."

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to find out the purpose of this clause.

Mr. LETCHER. There has been a document printed on the subject for months.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Congress appropriated $50,000 for this purpose, and the officers of the Government in California, without authority of law, have expended $220,000. Where is the law to sanction such a proceeding? It is sufficient for me, when I am called on to vote, to know that this expenditure has no sanction of law; and I hope it will be stricken out. It is a bad precedent to set to authorize the proceeding of a subordinate officer who has involved the Government to that large amount.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Ohio, and the House, the cause of this deficiency. By reference to the report of congressional proceedings, it will be perceived that the Thirty-Second and Thirty-Third Congresses made liberal appropriations for the survey of public lands in California, amounting to two or three hundred thousand dollars. The Thirty-Fourth Congress cut down these appropriations to $50,000. At that time, the surveyor general of California had made his estimates relative to the surveys of the lands in that State; he had thrown into the field his corps of engineers, and the lands were surveyed. He had no intimation whatever that Congress was going to act in this manner. Previous, I say, to the cutting down of the amount, he had put his men in the field, and they had gone to work. They have performed the work for the Federal Government in good faith, to pay for which this appropriation is asked. They have been kept out of it for one and, I think, two years. They have been kept out of this $220,000, which has been regularly expended, and they have been compelled to pay for money the ruinous rate of two per cent. a month, for money expended in the service of the Government. This surveyor general had to pay out his own salary, in order to carry on these surveys of the public land. I am willing myself to confine Federal officers to the strict letter of the law; but gentlemen should recollect the benefits which have accrued to the Federal Government in the survey of these lands. Over twenty-three million acres have been surveyed. These have been run into townships and sections, and half and quarter sections. A great many of them have been entered, and, by proclamation, four or five million acres are to be sold in May next, which will bring into the Treasury as many million dollars.

In the limits of that State there are one hundred and twenty million acres of land, all of which, except four or five million, is public land; and it has become necessary, in the adjustment of land claims there, to have the private land claims separated from the public land. Now, sir, we would have had to wait five years to have done that which this surveyor general has accomplished in six months; and this $220,000 would have been expended, and much more, in those five years. I say that while the gentleman from Ohio argues for holding officers to a strict accountability, and while there may be some truth and justice in that, yet there are exceptions to all rules, and especially so far as the State of California is concerned. If this were to happen in one of the Atlantic States, where early and reliable information could be had of the action of Congress, instead of in this far-distant State, to which it takes a month to go, the matter might come fairly under his rule. Then, taking into consideration the past legislation of this country; that these surveys have been of great benefit to the country; that this money is justly due; and that these men have had it withheld from them for eighteen months, I think justice demands that we should pass this section of the bill, which appropriates this $220,000.

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend the amendment by diminishing the appropriation $200,000.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment presents a good illustration of the manner in which this Government is carried on. The Constitution contemplates that there shall be no expense incurred and no money expended, except by the authority of Congress. The only use that Congress is to this Government is to act as a check to the executive department; to paralyze its arm and withhold the funds necessary in a case of practical usurpation of power on the part of the executive branch. Here is a case where Congress appropriated $50,000 for the accomplishment of a particular work. Under this authority, the Executive has gone on and expended $270,000. The question is, then, whether Congress can recognize an authority in the Executive or any of his subordinates to spend five dollars for every dollar which Congress has authorized to be expended.

I wish it to be remembered on this side of the House, that, after this appropriation has been voted, we are to be estopped from arraigning this Administration for extravagance in its expenditures of the public money; we are to be estopped because we voted for the appropriation.

The Union of yesterday had the following paragraph:

"We hear, accordingly, loud complaints against the Army expenditure. It is charged that it has run up in twelve years from $9,000,000 to $19,000,000; and at this last amount, though voted by a Black Republican House of Representatives, some of the members who voted for it now affect to stand appalled and aghast. If it were a fact that the Army appropriations were upwards of nineteen millions for the expiring fiscal year, the responsibility would belong as fully to the Black Republican House which voted them, as to the Democratic Senate that concurred in, and the Democratic Administration that administered, them. But the fact is not so."

That paper, it will be seen, holds that because we voted for extravagant appropriations for the Army, we have no right to make any question about the extravagance in the expenditures of the public money by the Executive. It turns out, Mr. Chairman, that the Republicans had not a majority in the last House, and that they are not, therefore, responsible at all for any appropriation made at that time. This, everybody knows. I hold that if there is to be anything in the shape of responsibility at all on the part of the executive department, if this House proposes to put any effective check on the expenditure of the public money, it must hold the Executive responsible for the expenditures which are made. And if we are to be called upon, and it is to be held to be our duty, to vote appropriations for whatever expenditures may be made, whether they be authorized by law or not, and whether they be necessary or not, why, then, there is no check and no accountability.

The argument of the gentleman from California [Mr. Scott] might have been a very proper one a year ago. It might be very proper to say in advance that the money was necessary for this expenditure. But his argument is, that inasmuch as it was necessary to spend this money, therefore, the Executive ought to do it. According to the gentleman's argument, the Executive is made the sole judge of the necessities of the country, and of what money is necessary to be expended for any particular purpose. Now, sir, I submit that it is the province and the duty of the House to determine—

Mr. PHELPS. I think the gentleman from Ohio is laboring under a misapprehension, when he attempts to hold this Administration responsible for the deficiency provided for in the clause now under consideration. If this amendment shall prevail, its effect will be to prevent the gentlemen who have performed these labors—those who were employed by the deputy surveyors, under contracts made with the surveyor general of California, and who went into the field, and traced the lines which they were instructed to run—from obtaining remuneration for those labors.

If they were the guilty persons; if they were the persons who had violated the law; if they were the persons who had exceeded the instructions given to them by the late Secretary of the Interior, I should be disposed to treat this as a private claim, and let them come to Congress and ask relief. But the surveyor general of that State, Mr. Hays, I believe, made contracts with deputy surveyors for the surveying of township lines, and for the sectioning of many of these townships. The deputy surveyors, believing that the surveyor general had authority to make the contracts which he did make with them, went forward, and in good faith executed their contracts, and performed every stipulation in them, and their work was submitted to the surveyor general and approved by him, and has been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and approved by him. The plats of those townships are now in the General Land Office. The surveyor general, having exceeded the authority vested in him by law, has been removed from the position which he held, by this Administration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Mr. Hays, the surveyor general of California, has been removed?

Mr. PHELPS. I say he has been removed by this Administration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has he been removed from office?

Mr. PHELPS. He has.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand not, but that he has been transferred from California to Utah.

Mr. MORGAN. I know that is the fact.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. He has not been removed from office to this day.

Mr. PHELPS. He was removed from the office of surveyor general of California.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if he is not in office now by the appointment of this Administration?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir; I am informed that he is not. The Secretary of the Interior informed me, in a conversation which I had with him on the subject, that he is not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has he not been appointed to the office of surveyor general of Utah by this Administration?

Mr. PHELPS. He has not been so appointed, as I am informed. He is holding no office at this time, as I am informed. I say then, sir, that the question is this: will you, after these men have made contracts with the surveyor general, believing that he had authority to make such contracts, and have performed this labor for the Government, of which the Government is now reaping the benefit, will you deprive the proper authorities of the means of paying for the services thus performed? And that, too, when you find that the conduct of the officer who exceeded his authority has met with the disapprobation of the executive department of the Government, and that he has been removed from office?

Mr. STANTON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out, by increasing the amount of the appropriation $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] in relation to the late surveyor general of the State of California, and I wish to make a statement in regard to that matter. Colonel Hays, who was surveyor general of California, acting in good faith, and believing that the Government would make an ample and sufficient appropriation for the surveys of our State, exceeded the appropriation to the amount of $220,000. As the gentleman from Missouri has stated, he entered into contracts with various parties to make surveys of the public lands in the State, and they put their men into the field. A letter was addressed to him by the Department, ordering him to curtail his expenses. That letter was in transitu at the time he made the contracts, and he did not receive it until it was too late to recall them. The indebtedness had been incurred. He, as the official agent of the Government, had taken upon himself the responsibility of entering into contracts with these parties. The Senators from California and my colleague and myself made strenuous efforts with the Administration, and with the Department of the Interior, to keep Colonel Hays in office—for there never lived a more gallant or a more honest man. We went and begged and intreated that he should be allowed to retain his office. We were told: "No; we cannot retain him because he has disobeyed instructions, and it would be establishing a bad precedent. Although we believe that every word you utter in testimony to his high character as a man is true, the law must be enforced and he must be removed."

But, sir, to prevent any tarnish of the name of a man revered and honored by every American, and who has frequently spilled his blood upon the battle-field in his country's cause, the President voluntarily offered him the position of surveyor general of Utah as a guarantee to the country that the act for which he was removed was nothing but what was considered a breach of duty, casting no reflection upon him as a man. That is exactly the state of affairs, and he never has accepted the position tendered him.

His removal from the office of surveyor general of California has been a source of sorrow and regret to every honest man throughout the length and breadth of that State, for he is universally beloved for his noble qualities.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I oppose the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying a word or two. I know nothing in particular in regard to Colonel Jack Hays. But I understood the gentleman from Missouri to claim great credit for the Administration for having removed him from the office of surveyor general of California on account of his transactions there in regard to surveying the public lands. In reply to that I stated, what I understood to be the fact, that this same man, for removing whom from office, great credit is claimed for the Administration, has been appointed surveyor general of Utah. That I still understand to be the fact, although I understand further that he has not accepted the appointment. That is all I have to say.

Mr. PHELPS. I stated that he was removed from the office of surveyor general of California.

Mr. SCOTT withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. SHERMAN's amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARNETT and LOVEJOY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out $3,311, in the one hundred and fortieth line, and insert as follows:

And the increase of business in the inspection and depredation offices of said Department, $5,218.

So as to make the section read:

For payment to clerks temporarily employed in the Post Office Department, on account of the extraordinary labors connected with the lettings of new contracts for the term commencing on the 1st July, 1838, and the increase of business, in the inspection and depredation offices of said Department $3,218.

This additional $1,907 is for the service of clerks employed in the inspection and depredation offices of the Post Office Department. The number of cases in these offices was, in 1849, one thousand two hundred and twenty-four, and in 1857 two thousand and sixty-two; and the Postmaster General reports that it is absolutely necessary, in order to keep up with the business of that branch of the service, that these clerks should be employed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am in favor of the increase in regard to the depredation office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following amendment to come after the last:

For lighting the President's House, and Capitol, the public grounds around them and around the executive offices, and Pennsylvania avenue, and Bridge and High streets in Georgetown, $5,000.

There is a full explanation of the reason for this amendment in a communication from the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
February 25, 1858.

SIR: I have received a letter from Joseph F. Brown, secretary of the Washington Gas Light Company, stating that he had presented Captain Meigs bills for gas consumed in the Capitol extension for the months of December and January last, amounting to $1,453 75, of which sum Captain Meigs is only willing to pay $650, leaving a balance of $793 75, which the company expects me to pay.

The appropriation for the current year was made in the fall of 1855, when there was not any prospect of the extension being ready for occupancy for legislative purposes; and, therefore, the cost of lighting that portion of the building was not included in the estimate, and for the same reason it was not included in the estimate for the next fiscal year. I cannot, of course, pay out of the present appropriation the bill for lighting the extension, as I should not be able to continue the lighting of the Capitol, President's House, Pennsylvania avenue, &c., which alone were contemplated in the appropriation. I have no data upon which to make a reliable estimate of the cost of lighting the two extensions.

I am informed that there are one thousand two hundred and sixty burners, besides fourteen or fifteen thousand jets above the glass ceiling in the new Representative Hall. These jets are merely used to ignite the burners, and are then shut off. The one thousand two hundred and sixty burners will average eight feet of gas per hour each; or a total of ten thousand and eighty cubic feet per hour, at a cost of $35 10. In addition, all the offices, halls, passages, committee rooms, &c., are profusely supplied with gas burners, and of course will consume an enormous quantity of gas. The gas consumed last month in the old Capitol, President's House, President's square, Lafayette square, and from the Navy-Yard to Georgetown, on Pennsylvania avenue, amounted, all told to $1,976 12. During the same period, I am informed, the gas consumed in the Capitol extension alone amounted to $1,000.

If you determine that I should pay for lighting the extension, I respectfully suggest that you ask for an appropriation of $5,000 additional for the current year, and $10,000 additional for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. B. BLAKE, Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the last:

For the purchase of the Masonic Temple in the city of Boston, for the accommodation of the United States courts, on terms agreed on by the Secretary of the Interior and the proprietors thereof, in addition to the sum of $100,000 appropriated by the act of 3d March, 1857, for the erection of a building for said purpose, $30,000.

The house was bought for $105,000. The $100,000 was paid, and this balance of $5,000 is due.

Mr. GARNETT. I rise to a point of order. This bill purports to be a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and this amendment is to be used in the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks whether this is a deficiency in the appropriation for this year?

Mr. LETCHER. I understand it to be a deficiency in this way: $100,000 was appropriated for the purpose of making this purchase, but a discretionary power was left in the Secretary. He could not make the purchase for the $100,000, but gave $105,000. The Government is in possession of the property, and this sum is asked to complete the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the last:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Utah Territory, from January 1, 1856, to June 30, 1857, $1,500.

That occurs in this way: By the first section of the act of February 21, 1856, the surveyor general's salary was increased from $3,000 to $4,000; and the $1,500 is to supply the deficiency in consequence of that legislation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. I offer the following amendment:

Add the following words to the second section:

Also, $24,000 to pay D. G. Burnett, and other claims of citizens of Texas, for timber and other property taken, and injury done to their lands, for the benefit of military posts in Texas.

Mr. STANTON. Is that amendment in order? The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not in order, it being a private claim.

Mr. BRYAN. If the Chair will wait a moment he may not make that decision. This is to supply a deficiency in the appropriation made at last session of Congress for the payment of said claims. The quartermaster general has informed me that $20,000 is required to supply that deficiency.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask whether an appeal has been taken?

The CHAIRMAN. An appeal has not been taken. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. GARNETT. I now offer the resolution which I have already indicated for reporting the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Virginia will be entertained unless further amendments be offered to the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to strike out the third section in relation to the extra compensation.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has not that section been passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The part proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Alabama was the last section of the bill, and was not passed by the committee. The gentleman from Alabama rose as soon as it had been read, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] was first recognized. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is the section which provides for the extra compensation. I have no remarks to make in reference to it.

Mr. CRAWFORD demanded tellers upon the motion to strike out.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR, of New York, and WALDRON were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported thirty in the affirmative—a further count was not demanded.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend by adding at the end of the third section the following:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for services claimed prior to the commencement of the Congress which passed the resolution or resolutions under which said claim or claims may be now or hereafter made.

The object of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, will be apparent to any member who has listened to its reading. I now propose to ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX], who offered one of these resolutions under which back pay was claimed by the Journal clerk of the House, whether it was his purpose to give him that back pay when he offered the resolution?

I have been a member of Congress for some years. I was a member when the Journal clerk, Mr. Barclay, first came into office. At the last Congress I voted against these resolutions; but while I might have been in favor of paying this individual this compensation for the last Congress, I never expected it would go back to the time when he commenced his services in the House. I ask the gentleman from Indiana, therefore, frankly to state whether it was his intention, when he offered this resolution in the last Congress, that it should include back pay for the last eight or ten years, and my vote upon this section may depend very much upon his answer. I ask the question because I do not believe it was the intention of the gentleman who offered it to include back pay, nor do I believe it was the intention of Mr. Barclay himself.

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman from Alabama, as well as myself, can understand the resolution when it is read. When it was offered, it was read twice, in the hearing of the House, at the Clerk's desk, before it was acted upon. Similar resolutions, in almost similar language, were passed by almost the unanimous consent of both sides of the House. I can only say that the resolution speaks for itself.

Mr. COBB. That is not answering the question. Did the gentleman, when he offered the resolution, intend it to include back pay for the last eight or ten years? The gentleman can answer the question directly?

Mr. COLFAX. I propose to answer the question exactly as I please. I state that, when I offered that resolution, every man who was a member of the House knew what Mr. Barclay's services had been. They knew how valuable they were to the House.

Mr. COBB. I have only five minutes, and I cannot yield to the gentleman to make a speech. I am well aware of the value of Mr. Barclay's services; but I believe he has never, until recently, been dissatisfied with the compensation he received. The gentleman from Indiana says this resolution was read twice by the Clerk. I know very well the manner in which such resolutions were passed. How many members of this House understood that it was to provide for back pay? If I was satisfied that was the intention of the House I would vote for the third section, for I am conscientious as to paying what we have pledged our faith to pay. But I do not believe that five members of the House, nor Mr. Barclay himself expected, when the resolution passed, that it was to go back to the commencement of his services in this House.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to say that I am willing to call to the witness stand Linn Boyd, of Kentucky, Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, and James L. Orr, of South Carolina, and to ask them to put their decision on record as to what his services are worth. I would be willing, indeed, to submit this whole question to either of them. There is not a man who has sat in this Hall or in the past Congresses but what knows the preëminent and unsurpassed qualification of Mr. Barclay for the responsible position which he now occupies. He is not only valuable in his own sphere, but in many others in the presence and view of the House. When the gentleman from Alabama is not satisfied with the answer I gave him, I say he has no right to ask me the question at all. I have the right to answer it exactly as I please. I proposed the resolution, after consultation with many older members, and it speaks for itself, plainly and unequivocally by its language. Not ten members voted against it, and I am willing now to ask the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, whether he thinks that that resolution gives one dollar more to this gentleman than what his services are justly worth?

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. According to the general practice of the committee, it is not in order for the gentleman to amend his own amendment.

Mr. COBB. I propose, then, to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. Nor can the gentleman modify it.

Mr. COBB. I only want to get the floor to make a speech, and put myself right before the House.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEWEAT and CURTIS were appointed.

The amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 50, noes 84.

Mr. COBB. I move to strike out, in the fourth line, the words "or may be;" and I will give my reasons for that motion. If these words are stricken out, there will be left the essential part of the section, and that which has been paid out by the officer of this House to any of its employes will be sufficiently provided for.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Indiana again to answer my question—whether it was ever contemplated to pay all this extra compensation to Mr. Barclay? The gentleman dodges that question, and does not answer it. If he will come up, and state that, when he offered the resolution, such was his intention, and that he is perfectly satisfied the House of Representatives intended to vote that amount of money when it passed his resolution, I may concur with him, because I am against the repudiation of any honest debt. But I am satisfied in my own mind that that was not the intention of the House; and I believe that such was not the intention of the gentleman; and I will continue to believe so, unless he answers my question. I must believe, too, that my worthy friend, Mr. Barclay, never contemplated receiving any such amount of money. I believe that he is an honest man, and would not attempt to practice any trick upon this House.

I am well aware of the valuable service of the Journal clerk, and the valuable services which he has rendered to this House and the country in the capacity which he occupies. I never heard that he was not amply compensated for these services at any time during the nine or ten years previous to the passage of this resolution. I never heard him complain when he received $1,800 or $2,160, that it was not an adequate compensation for the services which he rendered. It has not been long since he got twenty per cent. addition to that salary, and with that addition his salary amounts to very near as much as the members themselves got under the new compensation bill. I want to carry out whatever was the intention of the House in passing the resolution; and to get at that I asked the gentleman from Indiana a question; which he has refused to answer.

I am satisfied that many members will vote against the bill on account of this third section, and, therefore, I offer this amendment to perfect the section and make it as unobjectionable as possible, in order that the bill may pass. Gentlemen may vote to retain this third section with a view of having an excuse to vote against the whole bill, so that the Army appropriations may be lost. I intended to have voted for the bill with the Army appropriations and all the other items, if this third section could have been stricken out; but believing as I do that this third section does not carry out the intention of the resolutions passed last Congress, I shall, if it is retained, vote against the whole bill rather than stultify myself in regard to it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, you are aware of the difficulty which I have to encounter in the discharge of my duty to my constituents, in opposing this proposition, operating as I am against some of my most intimate friends. I acknowledge the services which have been rendered by the gentleman for whose benefit this provision is intended. But while I do that, was not Mr. Barclay satisfied—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. GARNETT. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill and amendments be reported to the House, with a recommendation to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in separate bills the items for deficiencies in the appropriation for each head of expenditure for the services of the present fiscal year, and in another bill all appropriations designed for the service of the next fiscal year; and also, with instructions to inquire what further legislation is necessary to restore to Congress an efficient control over the expenses of the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia; and it is that in the second clause of the resolution which provides for appropriations that are to be anticipated, he use words so as to justify the Department in anticipating that which is for the next fiscal year.

Mr. GARNETT. I accept the modification. Mr. Chairman the resolution which I offer—

Mr. PHELPS. Do I understand this to be an amendment to the bill under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. It proposes that the bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted with instructions.

Mr. PHELPS. Then no debate is in order if there is no amendment pending to the bill. The resolution closing debate requires the committee to report to the House the bill and the amendments which may be adopted.

Mr. GARNETT. I think I am in order in making a five minutes' speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia is in order.

Mr. PHELPS. But it is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. That is another question. The Chair did not understand that any question was raised as to the right of the gentleman from Virginia to debate the resolution.

Mr. PHELPS. I inquire whether it is debatable?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is clearly in order to move that the committee rise, and report the bill with a recommendation that it pass, or with any other recommendation that is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that the resolution is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But I do not think that any proposition of this character is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that it is not debatable. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia, as the Chair understands it, is that the committee rise, and report the bill and amendments, with a recommendation that it be recommitted, and so forth.

Mr. GARNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHELPS demanded tellers on the motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENSON and FENTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 60.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Bocock reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill (No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had instructed him to report back the bill and amendments to the House, with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order on the report of the committee. It is that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union can only report back the bill with a recommendation that it do pass or that it be rejected, but that it cannot report it back with such instructions as are there set out. In the first place, it requires an impossibility in requiring each item to be set out—an utter impossibility. In the next place, it further requires us to cut the bill up into pieces, to bring in a part now, and a part again; and then it winds up with instructions that the Committee of Ways and Means ascertain what can be done to restrain the Administration within the appropriations made. Now I say that these instructions are not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The report from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is certainly novel in its character. The Chair does not recollect to have seen or heard any such proceeding since he has been in Congress; but the Chair is of opinion that it is competent for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to recommend to the House to pass or not to pass, or to recommit any bill; and that the committee have also the power to recommend to recommit with instructions. The point taken by the gentleman from Virginia may be reasons why the House should not vote for the instructions; but the Chair does not perceive that these reasons are applicable to the question of order.

Mr. LETCHER. Take the latter part of the resolution; what connection has it with the bill?

Mr. GARNETT. I call the gentleman to order, and move the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the call for the previous question, and I will renew it, if he insist upon it.

Mr. GARNETT. For what does the gentleman want me to withdraw it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That I may make a suggestion in regard to this bill. This recommitment will amount to a practical defeat of the bill.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman is arguing against the resolution of instructions of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNETT. Therefore I cannot withdraw the call for the previous question. The majority of the House desire a bill that they can vote upon practically, and not be all forced to vote for things they do not like in order to get at things they do like.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 58, noes 88.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—ayes 76, noes 57.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask whether the resolution is susceptible of a division? and if so, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The call for division will be noted, but the Chair reserves the decision of the question as to whether the resolution is divisible, till the House comes to vote upon it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I merely wished to demand a division in time.

The SPEAKER. It will be noted.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for registering the same," passed February 18, 1793; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 248) to amend or define the act of July 29, 1850, entitled "An act providing for recording the conveyances of vessels and for other purposes;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 249) to release to the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac W. Brown, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of George M. Weston, commissioner of the State of Maine, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 250) to provide for quieting certain land titles in the late disputed territory in the State of Maine, and for other purposes. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution in relation to the expediency of defining more precisely, by law, whether, by the date of shipment at, or departure from, foreign ports, the value of merchandise imported into the United States shall be fixed for the purpose of estimating the duties thereon, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles McCormick, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 252) for the relief of Charles McCormick, assistant surgeon in the United States Army. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 8) to organize the Territory of Arizona, and to create the office of surveyor general therein; to provide for the examination of private land claims; to grant donations to actual settlers; to survey the public and private lands, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BRODERICK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 251) in relation to conflicting land claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ALEXANDER STEVENSON.

Mr. EVANS. A bill for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson, which has passed the House of Representatives, has been referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I am instructed by the committee to report back the bill without amendment, and recommend its passage. As this case has been a good while pending before Congress, and various bills have been reported to pay these parties, and the claim is for a very small sum, only about six hundred dollars, I ask the Senate to put the bill upon its passage at once.

The bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson was read for information. It directs the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the legal representatives of Alexander Stevenson, a soldier of the revolutionary war, in trust for his heirs, $654, being the amount of money due to him from the time of his enlistment, January 1, 1776, until the time of his discharge, in 1783.

Mr. CLAY. I would rather that bill should lie over until I can look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies over under the rules.

J. N. WARD'S IMPROVED FIRE-ARMS.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report lately made by a board of Army officers, appointed to examine and test the improvement in fire-arms invented and patented by Captain J. N. Ward, of the United States Army, with his opinion as to the expediency and propriety of adopting said improvement, either in the construction of new arms, or altering the old arms of the United States, and of an appropriation by Congress for that purpose.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, in the inquiries heretofore ordered to be made for the establishment of a national foundry, be instructed to include in such inquiry, sites at Harper's Ferry and at Shepherdstown in Virginia.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the holding of a second term, annually, of the United States circuit court in and for the State of Arkansas, and also the appointment of an additional district judge for the second judicial district of Arkansas.

EXPLORING EXPEDITIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have a resolution to offer to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. It is in these words:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate what measures, if any, are being taken, and under what law, for the publication of the results of the United States naval exploring and surveying expedition to the North Pacific ocean and China seas, under the command of Lieutenant John Rodgers, in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, 1856; and also of the results of the United States naval expedition to the La Platte river, in the same years, under the command of Lieutenant Thomas J. Page, or for the engraving of any of the maps, charts, or drawings, which are intended to illustrate the reports of these expeditions to Congress.

And out of what fund or appropriation in each and every case of work done in the premises, have payments for the same been made, or if not paid, then from what fund or appropriation is it designed to make payment; and also to inform the Senate under whose supervision these works are being prepared, and how many parties are now engaged upon the preparation of the materials for them severally.

I understand that there are two very heavy works in process of preparation, being the reports of these two explorations, the end of which I cannot see. How such matters get so far advanced without our being aware of them, I do not know. I know that if any printing or engraving has been done, or is being done, in regard to the reports referred to in the resolution, it is without the authority of Congress; and such things may be carried so far before Congress is aware of them, so much money expended, or contracted to be expended, that Congress may be forced to continue the publication, so that the parties who desire it succeed in attaining their object. Here are two more exploring expeditions. We began, I believe, with Wilkes's expedition. That was followed by Perry's Japan expedition, and by Gilliss's exploring expedition, and the Pacific railroad exploration, of the reports of which we have had many volumes. These works have caused the greatest portion of the immense printing expenditures of which Congress has been complaining so bitterly for a year or two past.

Here are two more such reports now in their inception—indeed I am afraid they have passed that period; they are considerably advanced. I do not know of any authority by which these works can be printed, or any law, or any appropriation, under which it can be done. I think there is a system of construction by which, hitherto, when moneys have been appropriated to carry on expeditions, and a surplus is found to be on hand when they return, that surplus is transferred from its legitimate object and applied to the printing and engraving of books. As these surplus funds or amounts of appropriation are never sufficient to pay the whole expense of the printing and engraving, Congress is then called on to complete it. I think this is the method by which such works as these are brought forward, and we are compelled to go on with them. I was about to say that there was not a single one of the works that I have alluded to, of which the printing or engraving has yet been completed, but I believe it would be wrong to say so; for I am certain there are some of them not yet completed.

I ask for the adoption of this resolution, and I speak of this matter in the hope that it may meet the eye of the officers having the disposition of the moneys hitherto appropriated for these expeditions. I trust the Secretary of the Navy will cause the fullest information to be furnished to Congress in regard to the subjects embraced in the resolution, even though points that Congress ought to know are not expressed in the resolution; and I hope the information will be given at once. If it be not speedily given, I will say to the Senate that I shall call again on the Secretary for him to furnish it here at once. I am satisfied that it is wrong that they should progress in this way without any authority from Congress in regard to the printing. I believe either of these works must be as expensive, certainly, as Gilliss's report, and may be as expensive as the Japan work, and may go as far, for aught I know, as the Wilkes exploring expedition, the publication of which is not yet complete, and of which there are about thirty volumes.

Mr. POLK. What does this cost?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. All of them cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I am not certain that they do not go to millions.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the resolution will be adopted at once, if the information is considered necessary; but I think the Senator from Arkansas will find that no such work as he has referred to has been either published or commenced. I have made some little inquiry about it, being desirous to see something of the La Plata expedition published. It was a very interesting survey. I found, at the last session, a little report of a few skeleton pages—perhaps ten or twenty—which I think was published at the expense of the officer himself, though I am not certain of that. I think that is all that has ever been published of that expedition. With reference to the Behring's straits expedition, under the command of Commander Rodgers, he has, with a corps of men, been getting out the charts as rapidly as possible; and they are some of the most useful charts this Government has ever prepared. They have been prepared under an express appropriation by Congress for charts; but I do not think, as far as I have made inquiry, that any history of the expedition has been contemplated.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I did not say there had been any publication in this case. But since the Senator from Florida seems to know something in regard to the subject, I will ask him if they have not already proceeded to contract for engraving extensively.

Mr. MALLORY. I have never heard of contracts being made for anything at all connected with this matter. I certainly know of no fund for such a purpose. I was never aware that a book was contemplated. I understood precisely the reverse: because there was no fund for it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will say that the Committee on Printing have sought, and are now seeking to arrest these extravagant expenditures.

Mr. PEARCE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that, in regard to the Behring's straits expedition, Congress, by a law passed at the last session, appropriated a sum of money for the purpose of preparing the reports of that expedition for publication; and it was expressly understood at the time—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Congress did what, sir?

Mr. PEARCE. It passed an appropriation for the purpose of preparing for publication the results of that expedition. A careful estimate was made and submitted to the Senate. I do not recollect the exact amount; I think it was $15,000.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Can the Senator inform me through what committee the proposition passed?

Mr. PEARCE. It was submitted in the Senate; I think it was proposed by the Committee on the Library. I know there was a conference with the Senator from Florida, who is at the head of the Naval Committee, upon the subject, and an appropriation was made, with the express understanding that the Government should not be called upon to publish. It was understood at the time that the publication, or the printing, would be done at the expense of the Smithsonian Institution, which thought the report sufficiently valuable to justify it in undertaking the expense of its publication. The appropriation was solely for the purpose of preparing the report. It contains a good deal of natural history, which is said by scientific gentlemen to be very valuable. It was thought the Government might well appropriate so far as to allow the scientific matter to be worked up into a proper report. After that, the understanding was distinct, to which I shall certainly adhere, that it was not to be published by the Government. It would seem to be right and proper if we send out expeditions to make collections of natural history and make surveys for the benefit of navigation, that we should print the charts and should prepare for publication the materials collected in the course of the study of the naturalists who went out with the expedition; but then it was distinctly understood, as I said before, that Congress should not be called upon to publish it, and certainly I for one shall never call upon them to publish it after that understanding this had.

Mr. MALLORY. The remarks which have fallen from my friend from Maryland have refreshed my recollection; and I think the appropriation referred to by him was agreed to by the Senate, upon the recommendation of the Library Committee. It was found that a number of scientific men had gone out with this expedition, and brought home very extensive specimens of natural history, which were collected in boxes, barrels, kegs, &c.; and it was designed, as I understood from the Committee on the Library, simply to prepare those specimens of natural history for publication. In connection with that, there may have been some engravings; but of that I have not heard. I presume, if there has been any, it has been under that appropriation—for the preparation simply, but not the general publication. There may have been a publication of the catalogues of the specimens, perhaps, but no more.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It may be that to the members of the Printing Committee erroneous information has come. I do not think so, or I should not have made it the subject of a resolution. I am certainly very well satisfied that we have already got a sufficiently large library, at the expense of Congress, in regard to botany, birds, snails, reptiles, bugs, and every species of strange, and it seems to me, rather unimportant and useless, branches of natural history.

Mr. IVERSON. I desire to put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Printing. I wish to know whether he can inform the Senate whether it is possible now to stop the printing of the second volume of Major Emory's report on the Mexican boundary? I perceive, from a document which has been laid on our tables this morning, that the printing of that volume is to cost $107,207. It contains zoology, botany, and insects, and nothing else. It is merely of a scientific character, and not of a very interesting character at that. A large amount—six thousand four hundred copies I think—have been ordered by the Senate, and eleven thousand five hundred and thirty by the House of Representatives, costing over one hundred and seven thousand dollars. I think if we can stop the printing of that, we shall save at least that much. The first volume has already been printed and distributed, and that is beyond our reach; but I think, if the Senate will stop the publication of the second volume, if it has not gone too far to stop it, that much public service would be done; and I commend that to the attention of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am unable to answer the Senator without examination, whether it can be arrested or not. I do not know to what extent the publication may already have gone. I have sent to the Superintendent of Printing for the purpose of ascertaining; and it is a subject that will be considered by the Committee on Printing. But I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these heavy printing jobs are not started by the Committee on Printing. That committee are getting a little uncomfortable in their feelings in regard to the extravagance of the expenditures that have taken place. They are not conscious in any respect of having been regardless of the public interests heretofore. They have not willingly acted to produce results like these, and yet they have become such as to call for animadversion from every side of this Chamber, and, I believe, from every press in the country. Hereafter I trust that whenever any publication or printing is contemplated, the duty of inquiring as to its propriety will be thrown on that committee, or the committee abolished, or that I for one, at least, may be taken off it.

I ask now for the adoption of the resolution, so that this information may be brought before us.

The information to which the Senator from Georgia refers, in regard to Emory's report, was obtained on a similar resolution, which I presented some time ago, on hearing something more of the character and cost of the survey of the western boundary, by Major Emory, than was very pleasant, or than I liked very well.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from Georgia will look a little into Executive Document No. 37, which I think he has in his hand, he will see that of the manuscript of the second volume of Emory's reports, there have been sixty quarto pages prepared. The document tells us:

"No part of these manuscripts has yet been furnished, except the report of Doctor Engleman, which has been printed, comprising about sixty quarto pages."

There are to be over six hundred pages of printed matter in this volume when it is ready; and of the engravings which constitute the expensive part of the report, there are to be two hundred and eighty-two pages of illustrations; and of these, twenty-two pages are yet incomplete, showing that there are two hundred and sixty pages of the expensive portion of the work already done, so that the greater portion of the expense has already been incurred. Now, I should be willing to arrest it; I would not care if there was not a dollar left to be paid to anybody. I would take the book, the pages of printed matter, the engravings, and the whole concern, and carry it into the street, and burn it up. It would be the best rebuke that could be offered to this sort of thing for Congress to pay for what has been done, take the work, and burn it up, so as to indicate to these people, "if you impose upon us, as soon as we ascertain the imposition we will arrest it;" and let the country understand that this business of governmental book-making is to stop.

I received this morning, from Philadelphia, a long article, published in some little, dirty newspaper there, headed "Brown on picture-books," in which I find myself most soundly berated for the part which I have taken in endeavoring to arrest this abuse; and Senators will find that there will be an attempt made by these outside jobbers to drag them into the support of measures like this through the influence of the press. I care, of course, nothing about what this fellow says. I would just as soon hear one thing about me as another. I see perfectly well, from reading his article, that he is somebody who has something to do with getting up these books. He is some fellow who has a job on hand. He winds up his article, after abusing me very soundly, in this way:

"Mr. Brown's education must have been sorely neglected; his sphere is evidently politics, not books; while his absurd speech manifests an amazing anxiety, equal to that of the renowned Dogberry, to be 'written down an ass.'"

I warn my friend from Arkansas that if he talks against reptiles and birds, and things of that kind, being published at the public expense, he will get to be a Dogberry after awhile in the estimation of these jobbers. Why, sir, I find that in the second volume of Emory's report there are twenty-seven steel pages of mammals, twenty-five stone pages of birds, forty-one steel pages of reptiles, and forty-one steel pages of fishes—all that in a report under the head of zoology, on a boundary commission, when the commissioner was simply appointed to trace the boundary line between two countries, and to mark it by little monuments! He comes back to us with that kind of material, and we publish it, as the Senator has said, at a cost of $223,000. That is the whole cost of publishing the report. All that Congress needs, all that Congress are expected to receive or pay for the publication of, would not cost $20,000. Nearly two hundred thousand dollars of the cost of this book is in publishing reptiles and birds. Why, sir, if we are going to have a zoological department of the Government, let us establish it under some law, and appoint some fit man to be at the head of it.

Then here are sixty stone pages of botany. There are also ten copper pages of botany, and seventy-seven steel pages of cactaceæ. If you are going to have a botanical school, or a botanical department of the Government, let us establish it under some proper head, some proper direction. It will cost less money to get intelligence that will be more useful to the country than these exploring expeditions. The officers who bring such works here ought to be rebuked by Congress.

Who appointed these men to get up these expensive books—books that I say again no publishing house in this country would put to press; books which you throw out upon the country by the thousand, that no publishing house ever republishes; pictures which no engraver except one paid at the public expense would ever think of wasting his time upon? It is done because you pay for it out of the national Treasury. Nobody ever thinks of reproducing one of these prints, though, as I have said before, you have no copyright. You do not pretend to deny the right of anybody to reprint or reproduce the books, but nobody ever did so; and why? Because they are of no account, and would not sell in the market for the cost of the paper on which they are printed.

Audubon made you a book of birds, an admirable book, such as the country needed, such as the people who appreciate such things were willing to pay for. If you want a book on fish, let somebody who understands the subject prepare the book, and sell it to those who are willing to pay for it. If you want a work on botany, leave it to botanists. If you want a book on astronomy, let some astronomer prepare it; let some learned professor get up the book and have it printed; but let us, in the name of all that is reasonable and just, stop sending out these miserable books to the country, that are a disgrace to the country; because, if you send them out with the imprint of the Government upon them, the learned men will suppose they are proper books, and when they look into them they will feel assured that you are mere pretenders to science. I care not how much these blackguards may abuse me through the public journals for the part I take in this matter. I will continue to denounce this system, because it is an abuse that ought to be denounced, and the miserable jobbers that come here with these things shall not stifle my voice.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I am really sorry that such unjust observations should be made by any newspaper in the country about the Senator from Mississippi, who little deserves it; and I am sorry, too, that the Senator should allow them to ruffle his temper and to make him unjust towards gentlemen of high reputation, of perfect honor, and thoroughly obedient to the law of the service to which they belong. Sir, Major Emory is a gentleman of great merit in his profession, but he has one merit which ought to commend him even to the Senator from Mississippi. He was appointed boundary commissioner with a very large appropriation, not thought to be too large at the time it was made, though it proved to be so, because he distinguished himself above all other men we have employed in that capacity, by bringing back and restoring to the Treasury $100,000 of the appropriation, a thing never done before, I believe, and for which I think we have never sufficiently commended him.

Mr. BROWN. How much will be left after we print the books?

Mr. PEARCE. I will come to that point directly. In regard to printing his book, and the collection of the objects of natural history, allow me to say this to the Senator: these collections are not made on the sole authority of the officer who goes out in charge of this expedition. It is not his individual act, unsanctioned by authority. In every case in which these collections have been made, the gentleman will find that the Departments have authorized them?

Mr. BROWN. I should like to know by what authority the Departments authorized them.

Mr. PEARCE. I am not undertaking to defend the Departments, and the gentleman may attack them if he pleases. My purpose is a different one.

Mr. BROWN. Then let my denunciation fall on the Departments if they act beyond the law.

Mr. PEARCE. But the gentleman has, I think, thrown out very unjust reproaches on the officer charged with these expeditions. I mean to defend them, and especially Major Emory. It is not for the officer, charged with a boundary survey, to look into the legislation of the country and see whether the Secretary had or had not authority to attach a scientific corps to the commission.

Mr. BROWN. If the gentleman will allow me I will say this is news to me. If the Department authorized the thing to be done, then I denounce the Department and acquit the officer. I acquit Major Emory, under that statement, of all blame.

Mr. PEARCE. That is exactly what I want to bring this discussion to. I think we are losing sight of the facts in the case. I say it has been customary for the Departments, for twenty years past, when they sent out military expeditions into such portions of our country as were newly acquired and little known to civilization, some of them perfectly terra incognita, to direct the collection of everything that might serve to illustrate the condition of that territory, its geology, climate, navigable waters, facilities for roads; its Indian tribes, and whatever displayed its resources and general character. These things are not without their value; and the Senator is entirely mistaken when he declares that these reports are trash; that they have no consideration with the reading public, and that scientific men scout them. Sir, they are prepared by scientific men, eminent in their several lines of study. I know that there are few persons who estimate the value of reports on natural history. I have heard in the Senate a great deal of ridicule thrown on what is called bugology, by gentlemen who, perhaps, do not take the trouble to ascertain that a great many of the material purposes of ordinary life and the arts derive benefit from this very knowledge of bugology. We never sit here a day, or put our hats on our head, that we are not making use of something which the study of insect life has contributed to the industrial arts and brought into common use. The very ink we use is the product of an insect, in part. The hats we put on our heads are partially made up of the product of another insect. We do not seal our letters without using the product of another; and nothing is more useful to those who till the ground than the study of those insects which are hurtful or beneficial to the great staples of agriculture.

There is value in this, and there is value in all of human knowledge, I do not care what it is. Nothing is beneath the study of man which is the work of his Creator. I do not mean to insist that the Senate shall authorize this collection of natural history to be made, or that they shall not find fault with the Secretaries, if they have, without authority of law, authorized them, or that they shall not put a stop to excess in this regard, by any legislation they think proper; but I think it is right and proper that these gentlemen who have gone out in charge of these expeditions should not be held up to the country as having violated their authority, and with bringing home to be described and published what is mere trash. These things are valuable. Many of the reports which have been made under these expeditions are considered as valuable by the students and proficients of natural history.

As for our officers, all they have done has been to bring home these materials, and we have authorized the preparation of them for publication, and their publication in every instance. It has never been done without our knowledge. I believe sometimes, as in the case of the railroad report, the printing has gone far beyond our expectations. I have no doubt it would not have been authorized if Congress had been aware of the extent to which they were going.

These reports of Major Emory were called for by a resolution of this body. They were sent in here in manuscript, with some of the illustrations, I know, but without the descriptions or natural history, for they could not be made in advance of the order of publication, I suppose. But we authorized the publication of a limited number of copies, and in that case the number of copies was much smaller than we had usually ordered—I do not know how much; one or two thousand copies. It is but right that we should assume the blame of these things, if blame there be, ourselves. We called for these reports and ordered their publication; and when we find out they are very expensive, we censure the Secretaries, and officers at the head of the expedition, and the jobbers who are by mistake supposed to have something to do with it. I do not know that any jobber has anything to do with it. Professor Torrey, who is eminent in his department, works up the botany of an expedition; and some gentleman learned in another branch of natural history, prepares the report of that; and whatever may be thought of these memoirs by the general reader, they are valuable to and valued by those whose studies have been in such directions.

As to these works never having been reprinted, allow me to say to the Senator, he is mistaken. Of scientific works published by the Government, for example, some at least of those printed under Captain Wilkes's expedition have been republished in England and republished in foreign languages. There is a copy of Pickering's Races of Men republished by Bohn in England, and reimported into this country—a smaller edition than that which the Government published, and which sells very freely in our stores; a book of interest to any man who studies his fellow-man. It is only within the last month that we have been applied to by the librarian of Cambridge University, England, for a copy of the entire scientific works of the Wilkes expedition.

Let us do justice, sir, though the heavens fall. There is no blame to be attached to these officers, depend upon it. I have no objection, though, to the call for information.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, most of these books were ordered to be published by the Senate while I was a member of the Committee on Printing. Although I think evil consequences have followed to a very large extent, and am free to admit those consequences, I am willing to say, at the same time, that I desire to bear my share of the responsibility of ordering the publication. I can only say, in defense, that I have deemed it my duty, since I did ascertain how much difficulty we were getting into, to prevent the repetition of it to as great an extent as I could. But I will say that the committee itself (and I think you, sir, will bear me witness to the truth of what I am about to state) has been led into error entirely in reference to the matter from different sources. In the first place, when these reports are called for and sent to us, we get comparatively but a very small portion of them. We get the report of the leader of the expedition; the other reports are not usually made out. No information is communicated to us of what will be the extent of the publication when the whole is completed. I do not suppose there was any member of the Committee on Printing for the two preceding Congresses—I certainly can say so for myself—that was at all aware, when the publication of these books was recommended by the committee, what the consequences were to be, and what the extent of the publications. We endeavored to get information from the Superintendent; but I suppose the Superintendent himself was not well-informed. You will remember, sir, that we were told that the Pacific railroad report would probably occupy three volumes. I believe seven have already been published, and two or three more are being printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will suggest to the Senators why it is that we cannot get the information. The reason is plain. So soon as the preparation of any work of that sort is commenced, Senators here, at the instance of some one outside, bring in a resolution for printing the usual number and some extra copies, and refer it to the Committee on Printing. Then the committee immediately is urged by the Senators who introduce these resolutions, and by the friends of the parties outside who may desire them to be printed, to report favorably, and then the committee have come forward, from want of experience in these things, at the beginning, and reported before the manuscript was complete. After the order to print is made, the parties proceed to make a tremendous book, which was not in existence when the printing was ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know of a single instance, during the time I was a member of the Printing Committee, when the call for these books was made by any one member of that committee. The first that we knew of it, the subject was referred to us, the book was sent to us to examine and report upon. The members of the committee are not—at least I can answer for myself, I am not a scientific man at all; and we could only take the book as it was, and consider the object for which the expedition was ordered, the information that was sought to be acquired. Considering that the object was important, and that the information which was got under it should be communicated to the country, and put in such a shape that everybody could get at it, we would propose its publication without knowing its extent, without its being communicated to us—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope we shall pass this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will require the consent of the Senate to proceed with it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have but a few words to say in explanation, and then I shall yield the floor. ["No objection."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was remarking that we were compelled to act on the main report made to us, without being made at all aware, from any quarter, what were the consequences that were to follow. For instance, take this very description of the Mexican boundary: We were not aware of the extent to which it was going. I did not myself know, though perhaps it was my duty to know, that scientific men were attached to the expedition; and I do not know to this day, though perhaps I ought to know, by what authority men of science were sent out to accompany the survey. I suppose it was done by the order of the Department which had the matter in charge. If they go out and make their collections, and they are proper persons to make the collections, it is of some consequence that the information thus obtained should be put in such a shape that it can be made available to the country. I have only said this in order to warn the Senate against, for the future, ordering these publications without knowing what they are in the first place.

I do not believe in the authority of the Departments, without power derived from Congress, when a specific duty is undertaken, to attach a large corps of savants to the expeditions themselves to make these collections, ascertain these scientific facts, communicate them to the country, and entail this expense on us. But, at any rate, I believe it would be a good rule on the part of the Senate and the Committee on Printing, never to order the publication of any book whatever, until the whole of it is submitted, and we know what it is to cost. The difficulty has arisen from our supposing that we were to have only the legitimate results of the surveys made public, the mere object that the country intended to accomplish by ordering it, without being made aware of all the details connected with it which, in my belief, were not included in the original law; but still I may be mistaken about that; I have not examined that. I think I am correct in the statement that the committee supposed, and were informed, that three volumes would cover the whole reports of the Pacific railroad, in the first place. We had no idea that the Japan expedition would go beyond a single volume at the time we ordered it; and so with other books, the publication of which has been ordered.

I believe there is such a thing as a reasonable economy, and such a thing as a very foolish one. If we have now advanced to the stage that it appears we have in reference to the publication of the second volume of Major Emory's survey, and have incurred so much expense upon it, I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Mississippi that we ought to pay for what has been done, so large an expense having been incurred, and then destroy the material that has been accumulated and paid for. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that this information is valuable—of very considerable value. The men who go out on these expeditions do not go to write scientific books, to make perfect treatises on the subjects which they are called upon to examine, but to communicate the results of their examination in reference to that particular region; and those results, being made known to the country, may be of very great benefit in divers ways, because it is important to the whole people of the United States that they should know, from the best sources to which they can have access, what are the resources and character of those sections of our country. When we have obtained the information, (and that is unquestionably the object of attaching these scientific corps to expeditions of this description,) when we have information of what these resources are, and have incurred so much expense in preparing it for publication, it is hardly worth while to dispense with it or destroy it. I know they cannot be perfect treatises; they are not intended so to be; but I believe there is no doubt that they are accurate and correct delineations so far as they go, and that the results thus ascertained are important as a matter of general information to the country, and in general relation to science.

Now, sir, I have one other idea to suggest, and then I have no more to say on this subject. This difficulty arises not particularly in regard to these books, but in regard to many others, from the disposition Senators have to oblige gentlemen connected with expeditions of one sort or another, who desire these publications for their own benefit. I have endeavored heretofore to arrest that. A gentleman who has acquired information of a certain sort, and communicated it to the Department, desires it to be published. He cannot publish it himself. He wants to communicate it to his friends; he wants the country to know what he has been doing; and he gets some good friend in the Senate to call for his report. The report is made; its publication is then moved, and extra copies are called for. It used to be an order of course in the Senate, in the first place, to publish the book without examination at all; but, I believe, we have a rule now, which was inserted, I think, at my instigation, requiring everything of this description to go first to the Committee on Printing, to see whether it ought to be printed at all. That will make one great saving. I remember one striking instance of the evil to which I allude; and that was in regard to a book called "Penal Codes in Europe," got up by Mr. Sanford. That was brought in here—a book of no sort of account, in my judgment. I looked it over afterwards. I opposed, and several of us opposed, the printing of the book, especially the printing of extra copies. It was said then that it would only cost two or three thousand dollars; and we had better print it, as the gentleman spent his time, though without authority, in collecting this information. We objected, and got it voted down, the Senate being of opinion that it was of no sort of importance, and ought not to be published. But at the heel of the session, when everything was in confusion, somebody called up the matter, and it passed through without any one knowing anything about it. The first I knew of it I received fifty or sixty copies of the book. If every Senator will only, each one for himself, make up his mind that he will not be instrumental in crowding anything of that sort on the printing bill of Congress, we shall save a very considerable sum of money, and save a good deal of expense that results from the time that is taken in the discussion of these matters.

Mr. HALE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to two or three facts. I wish to say, in the first place, that the fault does not lie with these scientific men, and it does not lie with the Departments, but it lies here in Congress, in this body; and it arises from our practical neglect and disregard every day of that provision of the Constitution which provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." That is just exactly as utterly and totally disregarded as if it was never written, and never thought of. The administration of the Departments goes on and they spend just what they please, just how much they please, and for just what they please, and come here the next Congress and ask you to make an appropriation for deficiencies. You give it to them, and you are going to give them $10,000,000 now. I have had occasion to look to see how the publishing of Emory's report started. The Secretary of the Interior says:

"The act of Congress, approved May 31, 1854"—

—he is giving his authority for the printing and engraving of Emory's work—

—appropriated a specific sum for that purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

"The authority by which the above maps, views, sections, &c., were engraved under the direction of the commissioner, is contained"— —not in law, but is contained——"in a letter from the Secretary of the Interior to Major Emory, dated June 17, 1854."

Major Emory having created the authority, the act of Congress of May 31, 1854, came in. It was a deficiency bill. We had appropriated money enough to carry on everything that we had authorized, but we had not appropriated money enough to carry on what Major Emory had authorized, and so in the deficiency bill that year we found:

"For engraving maps, views, sections, and natural history of the survey of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, $10,000, to be appropriated under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

There is the whole of it. It has got up now to $220,000. That is what the book costs; and the appropriation by law for it was in a deficiency bill appropriating $10,000. Look a little further. Next year they got in $10,000 more for engraving. They have actually spent over $40,000 for engraving, and paid it notwithstanding this provision of the Constitution that no money shall go out of the Treasury except by appropriations made by law. They succeeded in two years in getting $20,000 by law for engraving, and that authorized them, they supposed, to take some $20,000 more without law; and I will tell you how they did that. The engraving has cost over $40,000, and the Secretary of the Interior says:

"This amount, with the exception of the approximate estimate of $3,600 to be paid on completion of outstanding engagements," has been paid out of the unexpended balances of appropriations of August 4, 1854, and March 3, 1855, for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and appropriation of August 4, 1854, for compensation of commissioner, &c., by the following authority."

And then he gives the authority; I will state it presently. Here is the way it was done. This is a rich book; and you are going to pay, at this session, about five million dollars more to carry out the contracts for the Utah war, made in the same way—not with my vote, though; not a dollar. The "authority" I shall now state. Major Emory addressed a letter to the head of the Department, which I will read:

WASHINGTON, January 21, 1856.

SIR: * * * * * We are now engaged in the office-work, and it was doubtless the intention of Congress, and there is nothing in the law to the contrary"—

—it was the intention of Congress, because there was nothing in the law to the contrary!—

—that any balances remaining on hand after the conclusion of the field-work should be applicable to the office work. You will see by the above figures that we have saved in the field-work from the sum appropriated by Congress for its completion the large sum of $98,454 59, so that we have undoubtedly much more than is required to complete the office-work. I have therefore to ask, with a view to the simplification of my accounts and the more rapid execution of the work, authority to use said balance indiscriminately for the various items, including engravings, incident to the office and the final report of the operations connected with the boundary survey.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

W. H. EMORY,
United States Commissioner.

To whom was that application made to use this money in the Treasury "indiscriminately?" To the Secretary of the Interior. What did he say? Did he say, what he ought to have said, that no money could go out of the Treasury except by appropriation made by law? No. I will tell you what he said; his answer is very short:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, January 26, 1856.

SIR: In reply to that part of your letter of the 21st instant respecting the balances of appropriations for field and office work on the boundary survey remaining in your hands, I have to state that I see no objection to the use of the funds in the manner suggested by you.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. McCLELLAND, Secretary.

There is the difficulty, and the whole difficulty. I had occasion here, a few years ago, when Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, was Secretary of the Navy, to ascertain that he was paying out salaries of $3,000 a year to men who were not entitled to more than half of it; and I had a resolution sent to him, inquiring by what authority he did so. He sent back word—I have the document in my drawer now, but I will not stop to take it out—that his authority was a certain appropriation act, and the estimates. He took the astonishing ground, and the Comptroller of the day sustained him in it, that if he estimated for an officer's salary $3,000, and Congress voted it down, as they did in that case, still, notwithstanding that, he had a right to pay it, and did pay it, in the face and eyes of a vote of Congress, year after year.

Now, sir, it is in consequence of the utter and total disregard of the constitutional provision that money shall not be taken out of the Treasury except by appropriations made by law, which we wink at, which we know, and which transpires under our face every day, that these abuses have grown up, and will grow up. Here is an appropriation of $10,000 put in a deficiency bill; and upon that a book, costing $220,000, is printed, and we shall pay for it—not with my vote, though. I will not vote a dollar to pay for these things, whether to print books or to get up expeditions to Utah. I will not vote a dollar for anything unauthorized by law. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. This debate has gone on some length. I hope we shall have a vote on the resolution. It is a mere resolution of inquiry; and that we may not prosecute this discussion any further now, I will state that, so soon as the resolution is adopted, I shall ask the Senate to make a special order of the bill which has been reported by the Committee on Printing (S. No. 218) amendatory of the act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes. I believe that, by the provisions of that bill, we shall be enabled to arrest all these troubles and these expenditures in future that are improper in themselves. I hope we may have a vote on this resolution at once.

Mr. IVERSON. Before the question is taken, I desire to make a short reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, who has made pretty strong charges against the Administration, or, rather, against Secretary McClelland. In the language of the Senator from Maryland, a little while ago, let us do justice if the heavens fall. So far from there being any blame properly to be attached to Mr. McClelland for the expenditure to which the Senator referred, there is no blame to be attached at all. The expenditure of $222,000 for the printing of this work does not embrace any portion of those items to which the Senator referred. There was an appropriation made by Congress to carry on this boundary survey, of which Major Emory was put in charge; and the $40,700 for engraving, under the acts of 1854 and 1855, come out of the appropriation made by Congress for the survey. Major Emory says himself that in the field-work they saved $98,454 of the amount appropriated originally by Congress.

Mr. HALE. I read that letter.

Mr. IVERSON. I know; and then he proposes to apply a portion of that money, whatever is necessary, to the construction of the report in the office, and the preparation of such engravings as are incidental to the report. Was not that fair and proper? There were $98,000 saved after the expenses of the field-work were encountered. Was it not necessary, was it not proper, was it not appropriate that the report should be prepared here in the office? What value was the exploration, what value was the boundary survey, if the information obtained was not to be made up into a report, and submitted to Congress and to the country? According to the Senator's idea, all that was necessary and proper was that Mr. Emory should go and make a survey, mark it on the ground, and then leave it there, and not make any report on it. That would be perfectly valueless.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. The appropriation was not for printing.

Mr. IVERSON. I know it was not for printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. This is done in the Departments by a system of transfers, by taking an appropriation designed for one thing and applying it to another, because in some measure it is connected with that other. You appropriated money to prosecute the survey of this boundary; and because it was to be reported, that money was taken afterwards to print it. The printing or engraving for which this money was used ought not to be done except by an order or an act of Congress. I concur in some measure with the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to it, because it is a system of transfers that will eternally involve us in heavy expense.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Arkansas is mistaken. There was no transfer in this case. There were $98,000 of the original appropriation for this survey remaining in the Treasury after the survey was actually made; and out of that sum of $98,000, over forty thousand were expended in making out the report and engraving maps incidental to that report. There was no transfer at all, and there was no harm in it.

I rose merely to vindicate the Secretary of the Interior against the charge of the Senator from New Hampshire. There is no foundation for the charge. He did not expend a dollar but what was previously appropriated by Congress for the expenses of this work. After the expenditure of the $40,000 for these engravings and office-work here in preparing the report, there was nearly $50,000 left on hand. The Secretary did not take a single dollar out of the Treasury that was not appropriated. There was no deficiency in the case; there was a surplus; and he only authorized the commissioner to apply that surplus to the expense of making out the report here, in the city of Washington, in the office, and preparing the engravings incident to it. The whole expense of which I complain is the printing of these works. Whose fault is that? These $98,000 do not compose a part of that. The expense of $220,000 is incurred by a subsequent order of Congress that directs six thousand four hundred copies to be published for the use of the Senate, and eleven thousand five hundred and thirty for the use of the House of Representatives; and I presume the Senator from New Hampshire voted for that order. I have no doubt the Senator from New Hampshire voted for an order of that kind, directing six thousand four hundred copies of this book to be published and printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is mistaken, that is all I can say—I did not vote for it.

Mr. IVERSON. There were no yeas and nays; but if you will look on the Journal you will not find a protest against it from the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I was not a member of the Senate, I think, at that time.

Mr. IVERSON. Oh, yes. The order must have been recently, I apprehend.

Mr. HALE. It was made in 1854. I was not a member of the Senate then, and therefore the Senator will not find my name there.

Mr. IVERSON. At any rate the fault is here in Congress and not in the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HALE. That is what I said.

Mr. IVERSON. Let us take the blame on ourselves, and hereafter let us mend the matter by stopping this useless expenditure.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope we shall have the vote. We shall have a chance to debate this whole matter on the printing bill.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I give notice to the Senate that on Friday week, I will ask that the Senate do not adjourn over but that they will take up the bill (S. No. 218) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes." That will then bring up the whole subject.

Mr. STUART. The Senator had better not fix it for Friday, because private bills are the special order for that day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I will say this day week.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The President pro tempore. The special order of the day is the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad, from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long while I explain the provisions of this bill. The first section confers no power upon the President but to make a contract. The committee were careful, in preparing this measure, to confer no doubtful powers upon the President or any one else. We wished to avoid constitutional objections from all quarters, and simply provide for exercising powers conceded to exist under the Constitution from the foundation of the Government.

The second section provides for fair competition of bidders for the contract, by public advertisement in two papers in each State and Territory and the District of Columbia. It details how the bids shall be prepared; none are to be received that does not obligate the bidder to complete the entire road within twelve years from the date of the contract; and also, what extent and portion of the road, beginning at the eastern and western termini and progressing continuously until finished, shall be completed and put in operation during each and every year; also, the time that the bidder proposes to surrender the road, with its rolling stock and all appurtenances, to the United States for the purpose of being transferred to the States now in existence, and States which may hereafter be framed out of the Territories through which it may pass; also, at what rate per mile per annum, not to exceed $500 per mile. It is proposed to carry the United States mail daily both ways, under the direction of the Post Office Department, for the period of twenty years from the completion of the road; and also, at what rate per mile for a like period, under the direction of the proper departments, it is proposed to carry all military and naval supplies, troops, seamen, passengers, and freights of all kinds, for Government purposes, with the limitation that the contract price shall not, in any event, either of peace or war, exceed the sum which in time of peace has been heretofore paid for similar services of equal amount upon any existing route. It also provides that, after the expiration of said contract, all Government transportation shall be performed on said road, for reasonable prices, not exceeding those paid on other first class railroads, to be ascertained by Congress in the event of a disagreement between the Government and owners of the road.

The third section provides that the proposals shall be opened by the President after due notice, in the presence of his Cabinet, and such other persons as may choose to attend; and he is authorized and directed to enter into a contract for the transportation provided for in this act, with the party whose proposal shall be by him deemed most advantageous to the United States.

To guaranty the execution of the contract, the party with whom it is made is required to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury $500,000, or the value thereof in bonds, or certificates of stock of the United States, which may be subsequently withdrawn in sums of ten thousand dollars, when the Secretary is satisfied that these sums have been faithfully applied towards the construction of the road. It also provides that all questions of damages and forfeitures by reason of any breach of said contract, shall be determined by the express terms and conditions of the same, and the act itself is to be taken and considered as part of the contract.

The fourth section grants twenty sections of the public land to the mile, to be located on each side of the road, excluding all mineral lands lying within the State of California, and giving in lieu thereof agricultural lands lying nearest to the road.

The fifth section requires the contracting party to proceed without delay to locate the general route of the road, and furnish the President with a map of the same, who shall cause the public lands for forty miles on each side of the road to be surveyed, and the Indian titles thereto, if any, extinguished. It also gives the right of preemption to the lands not granted to the contracting party, but withholds them from settlement until the lands granted are selected.

The sixth section provides for the transfer to the contracting party of three fourths of the lands granted for the first twenty-five miles of the road that may be completed, retaining the other one fourth as security for the completion of the next twenty-five miles, which, when completed, three fourths of the land pertaining to that section shall in like manner be conveyed to the contracting party, together with the remaining one fourth of the previous section, and so on with each succeeding section until the road is finished and put into operation.

The seventh section provides that so soon as one section of twenty-five miles of the road is completed, the President shall cause to be issued to the contracting party $12,500 per mile of said section in United States bonds bearing five per cent. interest; payable nineteen years from date; and in like manner to cause the same amount of bonds per mile to be issued from each succeeding section of twenty-five miles, when completed, until the whole road is built; provided that the aggregate amount of bonds issued shall not exceed the sum of twenty-five million dollars. It also provides that the amount of bonds thus issued, with the interest on the same, shall be paid to the United States by the transportation and service provided for in this act. The committee were of the opinion that the amount due for such service within nineteen years would be fully adequate to pay the bonds, principal and interest, and hence they inserted that date for their payment; I may also be permitted to observe; that nineteen years being supposed to be the term of life of one generation it was not inappropriate to apply, in the building of this great work, the old Jeffersonian doctrine that each generation should provide for the payment of its own debts. This section also provides, that if the railroad iron used in the construction of the road shall be imported, the duties on the same will not be required to be paid in advance, but the amount shall be deducted from the first service performed for the Government under the act. It further requires that the contracting party shall use American railroad iron, if it can be obtained of equal quality and at a price not exceeding that imported from foreign countries.

The eighth section provides that, in the event of the contracting party failing to execute his contract, the same shall be forfeited, and the President shall proceed to relet that portion of the road uncompleted; provided he shall not stipulate for higher or other terms than those authorized by this act.

The ninth section provides that one half of the lands granted shall be unconditionally sold within five years, and the other half within ten years from the date of the issuance of the patents, under penalty of forfeiture to the United States of what remains unsold.

The tenth section sets apart two hundred feet in width of the public lands, on each side of the road, for railroad and telegraph purposes, and requires the contracting party to build the road in a workmanlike and substantial manner, and place upon it furniture and rolling-stock equal in all respects to railroads of the first class, when prepared for business; and that none other than rails of the first quality shall be used, and the gauge shall be six feet throughout the entire length of the road. It also provides for the construction of a telegraph line, of the most substantial and approved description, to be operated along the entire line of said road.

The eleventh section gives authority to the contracting party to construct additional tracks within the two hundred feet set apart for railroad and telegraph purposes; and that other roads shall be permitted to connect with it, on fair and equal terms.

The twelfth section provides for the transfer of the road to States and Territories through which it may pass, when it shall have been surrendered to the United States under the provisions of this act.

The thirteenth and last section provides that the contracting party shall keep books open for inspection, shall make annual returns of the receipts and expenditures of the road to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall lay the same before Congress at the commencement of each session.

With this synopsis of the bill, I shall now proceed briefly to state the advantages that will result from locating the eastern terminus, as provided for in the bill, on the Missouri, between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers. It is central, as regards the population of the Atlantic and western States.

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the Senator from California, who, as he understands this bill, will select the route of the road between the two termini fixed by the bill—the President, or the contractors?

Mr. GWIN. The contractors, of course, will make the selection of their route. The President may have some power in the selection of the contractors and the bids that may be put in; but it is intended by the bill that the contractors shall have the selection of the route upon which they will build the road.

Mr. POLK. I will ask the Senator whether the language is more definite on that point than it was in the bill for the overland mail route?

Mr. GWIN. I do not recollect the provisions of that law. I think that was entirely left to the contractors.

Mr. POLK. I think it was, too; yet I believe certain routes were marked out in the bids, to which the contractors were confined.

Mr. GWIN. The intention was that the contractors should select the route. Having given a synopsis of the provisions of the bill, I shall proceed to show very briefly the advantages that will result from locating the eastern terminus in the manner proposed in the bill.

Whether the road should approach the Pacific on the forty-first, thirty-fifth, or thirty-second parallel of latitude, it can with great facility be connected by railroad with the principal commercial marts on the Atlantic, north and south, by roads built, building, and projected; as will appear from the following table, taken from Pacific railroad surveys, vol. 1, page 32:

I will also give a brief synopsis, from official documents, of the routes terminating at San Francisco which have been surveyed by the United States engineers. The route on the forty-first parallel ascends the valley of the Platte river and its tributaries, rises to the great plateau upon which Fort Bridger is situated, more than seven thousand feet above the level of the sea, and, by the South Pass or by the Cheyenne Pass, crosses the great interior basin at its widest point. After passing the divide of the Sierra Nevada, by the Madelin or Noble's Pass, it descends to the Sacramento valley.

The most serious difficulty of construction on this route is along the Pitt and Sacramento rivers, where, for the distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles, they run through a mountainous region with precipitous banks, which would make the expense of constructing a railroad very great; but further explorations may discover a more practicable and economical entrance to the Sacramento valley. The length of this route, from the mouth of the Platte river to Benicia, in California, is two thousand and thirty-two miles; the estimated cost of construction is $116,000,000. From the mouth of the Kansas to Benicia is two thousand one hundred and sixty miles, and the additional cost will be $3,000,000. If it should pass by Oroville, Marysville, Sacramento, Stockton, and the southern extremity of the bay of San Francisco to the city of San Francisco, both the distance and the expense of construction would be greater. The route on the thirty-eighth parallel, by the Cochitopa Pass, may be considered impracticable, from the enormous cost of construction of the five hundred miles between the tributaries of the Rio Grande and the Great Basin.

The Cimarron route, leaving Westport, crosses the Arkansas river near Fort Atkinson, passes along the Cimarron river, and unites with the route of the thirty-fifth parallel, near the head waters of the Pecos river, or before descending to the Rio Grande. By this route, the distance from the mouth of the Kansas to San Francisco is two thousand one hundred miles, and the estimated cost of construction $106,000,000. The length may be reduced, as explained in the remarks on the route on the thirty-fifth parallel, ninety miles, and the cost of construction will be four or five million dollars less. The route on the thirty-fifth parallel follows, as near as practicable, the interlocking tributaries of the Mississippi, Rio Grande, and the Colorado of the West. The length of this route from the mouth of the Kansas river to San Francisco is two thousand one hundred and eighty miles, and the estimated cost of construction $108,000,000. It can probably be shortened ninety miles by a route not yet surveyed by the United States engineers, but believed to be practicable by the exploring officer, and the cost of construction reduced four or five million dollars.

The characteristic features of the route on the thirty-second parallel are the low elevation of the mountains and their passes, and the great extent of the table lands it traverses. It enters the valley of the Rio Grande by El Paso, crosses to the Gila, descends that stream to the Colorado river, crosses the plain known as the great Colorado Basin, and reaches San Francisco by two very favorable routes—one near the coast, and the other by the Tulare valley. The length of this route from the mouth of Kansas river to San Francisco is two thousand two hundred and twenty miles, and its estimated cost $95,000,000. The Pacific ocean may be reached at shorter distances by branches from this route to San Diego and San Pedro. The distance on this route being but little greater than that on the thirty-fifth parallel is thus explained. From the mouth of the Kansas it has a direction a little west of south, passing near Fort Arbuckle and the head waters of the Colorado of Texas. From the crossing of the Red river it is coincident with the line generally known as the El Paso route, nowhere following for any considerable distance the meandering course of rivers, but passing over, in direct and straight lines, the extensive plains that form its peculiarity. It is of but little greater length than the route north of it, which has the same termini. That route, (on the thirty-fifth parallel,) in a large part of its course, passes along the banks of rivers and through a mountain region more rugged and elevated than the district a few degrees further south.

The great difficulties to be encountered in the construction of a railroad to the Pacific will be met with between the ninety-ninth meridian—where, it is supposed, the so-called uncultivable region begins—and the Pacific slope of the Sierra Nevada and coast range of mountains. Throughout this great uninhabited district, the differences between the extent of arable land, quantity of water, fuel, and timber, found on the several routes, are not such as to form an important element in the consideration of the greater or less degree of practicability of constructing and working a railroad. The great differences between the practicability and economy of the routes are to be found in the character of the surface of the ground, in the length of the routes across this uninhabited belt which all must cross, and, lastly, of the difficulties of climate. In the following table, besides containing other and valuable information, the extent of this uninhabited district is stated on all the routes which I have presented to the Senate:

* Supposing the route to be a straight line, with uniform descent, from the Un-kuk-oo-ap mountains (near Sevier river) to the entrance of the Tah-ee-chay-pah Pass—the most favorable supposition possible.

† The estimate of Lieutenant Parke for the construction of a railroad by this route, from Fulton to San José, is $82,812,750. Adding $2,025,000, the office estimate for the route from San José to San Francisco, Lieutenant Parke's total estimate from Fulton to San Francisco would be $84,837,750.

‡ The estimate of Lieutenant Parke for this route is $59,005,503.

The sum of the minor undulations (not included in the sum of ascents and descents here given) will probably be greater for the routes near the forty-seventh and forty-ninth parallels than for the other routes.

With the amount of work estimated for the roads in this report, the equated lengths, corresponding to the sums of ascents and descents, have but little practical value. With a full equipment and heavy freight business, the sum of ascents and descents becomes important.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, APRIL 13, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 97.

In the preparation of this table one important fact must have escaped the scrutiny of the scientific gentlemen who prepared it. It is this: that the great Colorado basin, included in this so-called uncultivable region, has been proved by those very surveys, and others made under the direction of the surveyor general of California, to be one of the richest in soil on the continent. It is mainly below the level of the Colorado river, which renders its irrigation easy and practicable; and when thus reduced to cultivation its fertility will not be surpassed by the celebrated valley of the Nile. In support of this fact, I will quote further from the Pacific railroad surveys:

"An analysis of the soil of the alluvial portion of the Colorado desert, which covers an area of four thousand five hundred square miles, and is four times greater in extent than the land under cultivation on the Mississippi river, between the mouth of Red river and the Balize, shows that it has all the elements of great fertility, and, but for the adverse climatic conditions, would rival in its productions the best lands of the delta of the Mississippi. According to the barometrical levelings of Lieutenant Williamson, the alluvial portion of this plain is lower than the surface of the Colorado river; and should this be confirmed by more accurate modes of leveling, as there is every reason to believe it would be, an extensive system of irrigation would entirely change the character of its surface by the introduction of water, the only element required for great productiveness. About one half of the Colorado desert is within our territory."

This will reduce the extent of this so-called uncultivable region from one to two hundred miles on the route on the thirty-fifth and thirty-second parallel, and to this extent tend to remove the impression on the minds of many friends of this great measure, that it will be impossible to build a road over this great uninhabited country, and that it could not sustain sufficient population to keep up the road after it was constructed. It should also be borne in mind, that these estimates in the report of this sterile region extend to the Pacific coast, when it is known that there is no more productive country in the world than the region between the Sierra Nevada and coast range of mountains and the Pacific ocean. In bringing the reports of the engineers to the notice of the Senate, I do not wish to be understood as acquiescing in their views as to this uncultivated region. Their theory, I believe, practice will demonstrate to be delusive. I well remember when some of the richest lands in the world, and proved to be such by being the most productive, were, but a few years ago, by everybody in California, called poor and worthless. I believe that the greater portion of this so-called uncultivable country has fine agricultural capacity, capable of sustaining a dense population, and is not surpassed in mineral wealth by any portion of the continent.

Mr. President, I have refrained from touching upon the vital interests of the country involved in the passage of this bill. I leave that task to other Senators more able to do justice to the subject, and whose duty it may be to give their views at large so as to be placed right before their constituents. I have no speech to make for home consumption. My constituents are awaiting our prompt action upon this bill with an earnestness and intense anxiety that I shall not attempt to describe. Upon its passage depend our happiness, prosperity, and greatness as a people. Without it our future is dark and gloomy. Having on many former occasions given my views at large on the merits of this great question, I have confined myself on this occasion to a statement of the contents of the bill, and a reference to the sources of information upon which the committee based their action in reporting it to the Senate, which leave no doubts on my mind, that if it becomes a law it will insure the building of the road on one of the three routes indicated, the construction of a railroad on either being in my opinion entirely practicable.

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to inquire of my colleague if he has provided in his bill for making it obligatory on the contractors to provide a substantial system of telegraphs?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am glad of it; and there is another point to which I desire to direct attention. I am satisfied that the emigrant route from Independence to Carson valley, which strikes the border of California, will be selected by the contractors if it is left to them to decide, and I desire the Senate to put this bill in such a shape that the selection of the route shall be left entirely to the contractors.

Mr. GWIN. The bill so provides. The first section will enact that "The President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed——leaving him no discretion—

—to enter into a contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad, from a point on the Missouri river, between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers, to San Francisco, in the State of California, on the most eligible route, reference being had to feasibility, shortness, and economy."

And another section provides that the contractors shall "locate the general route of said road."

Mr. BRODERICK. Three fourths of the population of California is north of San Francisco; and if the extreme southern route were selected—that is, on the thirty-second parallel of latitude—it would cost more to build a road from where it would strike California to San Francisco, than it would cost the Government to build a road from Salt Lake to the boundary of the State of California. When you look at the map, it appears that the southern route is much the nearest to California; but that is a great mistake, as is shown by experience, for we find emigrants from Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, going all the way around to Independence, and then crossing on the old emigrant route. If a clause be inserted making it obligatory on the President or the heads of Departments to leave the route entirely to the contractors, I am for the bill as reported by my colleague. But I hope that my colleague will examine more closely, and satisfy himself on that point, because it is a matter of great interest to the people of California. I agree with him that the people of California are looking to Congress to give them a railroad. We are in the habit of sending about four million dollars monthly to the Atlantic side of this Union. I have ascertained, since I have been in Washington, that on the part of a great many distinguished men here, California is considered a myth; but, sir, it is a very large and growing State; her population to-day amounts, I believe, to six or seven hundred thousand people, and it is constantly increasing. We should increase much faster if we could only have a cheap communication between the western States and California. I shall wait for the purpose of hearing this bill discussed; and if I can aid my colleague in any way in passing it, I shall do so with pleasure.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to offer a verbal amendment to the bill in the second section, in lines fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen, by striking out the words "that portion of" and also "which passes through the Territory of the United States."

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from California that perhaps he had better postpone his amendments until the Senate is fuller.

Mr. GWIN. This is a mere verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until one o'clock to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the appropriation bill which I reported this morning, and which will consume but a short time.

Mr. IVERSON. By a special resolution, to-morrow is set aside for private bills.

Mr. HUNTER. Postponing this subject until to-morrow will not interfere with that. It will only keep this bill the special order.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to ask the Senator from California whether the table he has recited has been printed?

Mr. GWIN. I took it from the Pacific railroad surveys.

Mr. BRODERICK. I should like to have it printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, which was reported from the Committee on Finance with two amendments.

The first amendment was, in line forty-two of the first section, to strike out the word, "for," and insert, "and miscellaneous expenses of," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of blank-books, stationery, arms of the United States, seals, presses, and flags, and for the payment of postages, and miscellaneous expenses of the consuls of the United States, $40,000.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a mere verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid out of the Treasury for any expenses which accrued or shall accrue before the commencement or after the termination of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. The bill is all according to law, merely paying the salaries of ministers and consuls.

Mr. MASON. I would ask my colleague, as I am not very conversant with the forms of the appropriation bills, if there will be any other bill coming from the House of Representatives providing for the expenses of the consular or diplomatic service during this session, except this one?

Mr. HUNTER. The civil and diplomatic appropriation bill is now divided into three bills. There will be a miscellaneous bill, upon which, I suppose, it will be proper to put the amendment which my colleague designs.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the question was stated to be on concurring in the amendments.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish the Senator from Virginia to explain the occasion of striking out the second section.

Mr. HUNTER. There is occasion for doing so. That section proposes to restrict the expenditures within the year.

Mr. COLLAMER. The second section confines the expenditures to the year; and why is it stricken out?

Mr. HUNTER. Because it is found, from experience, that it is impossible to confine the appropriation of one year to the expenditures of that year. There is already a general provision, which is a sufficient safeguard, that when an appropriation is more than two years old, it goes to the surplus fund, and can no longer be used. I am assured by the State Department—and I should have known it if I had not been so assured—that the evidences of many of the expenditures, within the year for which it is designed to provide, do not come in during the year, but perhaps early in the next succeeding fiscal year; and the effect of this section would be, that the money could not be applied to them.

Mr. COLLAMER. It could if the expense accrued within the year.

Mr. HUNTER. Not according to the construction which the Department put upon it, and the construction which, I suppose, is designed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask that the whole bill be read, for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the bill had better be laid over until to-morrow, unless there is some particular reason for passing it to-day. I should like to look into it.

Mr. HUNTER. There is no particular object in passing it to-day. It can be laid over, if the Senator wishes to examine it. I only desired to expedite the public business.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from Rhode Island will suggest any particular objection he has to the bill, perhaps I can satisfy him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I have objection. I want to read the bill before it is disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART in the chair.) Objection being made, the bill cannot be read a third time to-day, but must go over until to-morrow.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to call up a little resolution, to which there is no objection, that ought to be passed. There is a resolution that was passed by the Senate, extending the time for the naval courts until the 16th of April, and it was sent back here from the House of Representatives with an amendment, and that amendment has been amended and another made to it here. It only remains on the table, to pass on the amendment to be sent back, and the 16th of April is very near. I presume there is no objection to it. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs suggested to me to call it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'an act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

The House amendment is to add:

"Except as to any case pending, undetermined, before any court of inquiry under the act of the 17th of January, 1857, at the expiration thereof."

The Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate reported back the amendment of the House of Representatives, with an amendment to strike out "17th" and insert "16th," which was agreed to; and an amendment, offered by Mr. FESSENDEN, was adopted on the 12th of March, adding to the House amendment:

"And excepting, also, the case of any officer who was absent from the country at the time of the passage of said act, and had not returned previous to the 16th of January, 1858, and any such officer shall be entitled to all the privileges conferred by said act: Provided, He applies for the benefit thereof at any time within sixty days after his return."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the House amendment as amended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the honorable gentleman who has charge of this joint resolution, that perhaps it would be well to say that they should have the privilege of availing themselves of the benefits of this resolution, after its passage, and I move, therefore, that the words be changed so as to make it read, "after, the approval of this joint resolution." My amendment is to strike out the words "at the time" and insert "after the passage," so as to read, "excepting also the case of any officer who was absent from the country after the passage," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that that amendment cannot be made to the amendment. The other was an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It cannot be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot consent to that, because the chairman of the committee is absent, and it was by an understanding with him that the amendment was made to apply to the case of absence at the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will require unanimous consent to make the amendment suggested. Is there objection?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the amendment cannot be made. The question is on agreeing to the House amendment with the amendments which the Senate have already adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. SLIDELL. I ask the Senate to take up the next special order.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding; the bill (S. No. 85) supplementary to the act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal certain acts therein mentioned," approved April 20, 1818; the resolutions reported by Mr. MASON from the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to the seizure of William Walker; and Mr. SLIDELL's amendment to these resolutions.

Mr. SLIDELL. As the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, as well as the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is now under consideration, I will first proceed to explain the reasons why I shall vote for the amendment of my friend from Mississippi, and then present my views generally on the subject of our neutrality laws, and especially on the necessity of such a modification as is proposed by the amendment I have offered to the resolutions of the committee.

I presume that the Senator from Wisconsin, in offering his resolution for the presentation of a medal to Commodore Paulding, did it rather to have an occasion to express his individual approbation of the conduct of that officer, than with any hope of his proposition obtaining the sanction of the Senate. The medal has heretofore been given only as a recompense for gallant service, accompanied by some degree of personal danger. To this rule I think there can be found no exception. The resolution seeks to confer it for gallant and judicious service. The Senator from Wisconsin will scarcely claim that there was any very remarkable display of gallantry in the capture of one hundred and fifty men, armed with rifles only, encamped on a sandy beach, directly under the batteries of a squadron mounting sixty or seventy heavy guns, and served by at least eight hundred men. Was his conduct judicious? This question presents a double aspect: was the capture of Walker authorized, either by his instructions or by the law of nations? or, if by neither, were the circumstances such as to justify the exercise of a remedy above and beyond law, for effecting a high and useful purpose? I admire the man who, in great emergencies, dares to take a responsibility which his position imposes upon him; but he does it at his peril. He must abide the verdict of public sentiment; the popular mind has almost unerring instincts in such questions. If he be right, he will be sustained and applauded; if not, he must bear the consequences of his want of judgment and discretion. The masses will never be severe when the error proceeds from excessive zeal in the performance of a supposed duty.

It is not pretended that the capture of Walker, on the territory of Nicaragua, was justified by the instructions given to Paulding directly. Those to Lieutenant Almy of 12th October, expressly confine him to the prevention of the landing of any military expedition in any part of Mexico or Central America. These instructions were, of course, known to Commodore Paulding; indeed, he expressly admits, in his letter of 15th December, that he had gone beyond his instructions. He says: "I am sensible of the responsibility I have incurred, and confidently look to the Government for my justification." Were the circumstances so grave and urgent as to justify the commodore in assuming the responsibility of exceeding his instructions? Clearly not. Walker had with him one hundred and fifty men, without artillery, and with a very limited stock of provisions; his arrival had produced no other feeling than that of alarm among the people of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. No aid could be expected from them, and all reinforcements and supplies from the United States were effectually cut off. In a few weeks his motley band, composed mainly of desperate adventurers, with a few enthusiastic and misguided striplings, would have deserted him, and, probably, appealed to the American squadron for protection and subsistence. Walker would have returned, for the third time, to the country whose allegiance he had renounced, and whose hospitality he had abused, a broken-down and harmless Quixote. None of the false sympathy which has since been enlisted in his favor would have been excited; he would have wandered about for a while, complaining of the Administration and boasting of what he would have achieved had he been allowed to carry out his schemes without the interference of the Executive, and, perhaps, have settled down at last in the pursuit of an honest livelihood. Paulding has, for the time, succeeded, in the eyes of many of our people, in investing him with the martyr's crown; and pseudo-martyrs have, in all ages, found devotees to worship at their shrine.

In speaking thus of William Walker, I know that I shall bring upon myself the violent denunciation of certain presses, and perhaps shock the honest prejudices of many who, without examination, or reflection, have approved his course, and admired his character.* The man who can be deterred, by such considerations, from expressing his opinions, has no business here; he is unworthy of the high trust which has been confided to him. Who and what, then, is William Walker? I speak only of his career since he first undertook the mission of regenerating Mexico and Central America. Except in that connection, I know nothing of him. I am willing to concede that he is a man of good education, fair intelligence, gentlemanly habits, and, in private life, a man of irreproachable character. His first military enterprise was against Sonora; he landed there with a handful of brave men, and failing to meet with any sympathetic response from the people, of whom he proclaimed himself the champion and liberator, he escaped, leaving most of his deluded followers to perish miserably. We next find him landing in Central America, where, having espoused the cause of one of the factions that divide and devastate that wretched country, of which revolution and anarchy have long been, and, with the mongrel race that now occupies it, will ever be, the normal condition, he succeeded, with the aid of repeated reinforcements from the United States, in making himself virtually the supreme authority of Nicaragua. Not contenting himself with the substance of power, he must needs have the title also; by the convenient farce of a popular election, played with the soothing accompaniment of the bayonet, he became the President of the free and independent Republic of Nicaragua. He now, for the first time, had an opportunity of displaying his qualities as a statesman. One of his earliest acts was to confiscate the valuable property of an association of American citizens, engaged in the transportation of passengers across the isthmus—a company that had rendered him the most essential service in conveying the troops and supplies that were necessary to the support of his government. This new William the Conqueror next proceeded to dispossess the ancient proprietors of their domains, distributing them among his adherents. Among the recipients of these bounties, we find some whose civil services had secured to them this distinguished mark of presidential favor, and who, in the hope of perfecting their titles, were since actively engaged in getting up his last expedition. His whole career, as President, was marked by rapine and blood. In this, he but too faithfully carried out the programme of a military government, not transitory, but permanent, indicated by his letter to General Goicouria, of 12th August, 1856, quoted by the Senator from Maryland, and in which he deposes him to solicit an English alliance, "to cut the expanding and expensive Democracy of the North."† This, then, is the chosen

* The New Orleans Delta has insinuated that the few words I said on the 28th January, in relation to this subject, were elicited by an attack previously made by him on me, and were uttered in a spirit of recrimination. Now, the only occasion on which I have been honored by the notice of that gentleman, that I am aware of, is said to have been in his speech made at Mobile on 25th January. I have the report of that speech, as published in the Mercury on the following day. In that report my name is not mentioned; but after Walker's arrival at New Orleans, and conference with his advisers there, he published in the Delta his amended version of it, in which my name was used. This was on the 29th January, the day after I had spoken of him in the Senate. From this specimen of the fair-dealing of the Delta, the mouth-piece of Walker and his prime ministers, the public may judge of the credence that should attach to anything that may be said by it of me.

† "GRANADA, August 12, 1856.
"MY DEAR GENERAL: I sent your credentials for Great Britain by General Cazeneuve. They are ample, and will be, I hope, not without result. If you can open negotiations with England, and secure for Nicaragua the port of San Juan del Norte, you will effect a great object. It will be a long step towards our end. Without San Juan del Norte, we lack what will be, in the end, indispensable to us—a naval force in the Caribbean sea. The commercial consequences of this possession are nothing in comparison with the naval and political results.

"With your versatility and (if I may use the term) adaptability, I expect much to be done in England. You can do more than any American could possibly accomplish, because you can make the British Cabinet see that we are not engaged in any scheme for annexation. You can make them see that the only way to cut the expanding and expansive Democracy of the North, is by a powerful and compact southern federation, based on military principles."

instrument for the Americanization of these benighted regions! I will not recapitulate his various atrocities. Suffice it to say, that he, who was at first hailed as a deliverer by a portion of the people of Nicaragua, was soon regarded by its entire population with detestation; whilst having, by his own folly, cut off all available sources of support from the United States, he was but too happy to secure his own safety, and that of the miserable remnant of his followers, under the flag of the country whose citizenship he had repudiated. We have the most conclusive evidence of not only the universal horror in which Walker himself, but also of the appalling dread in which his very name is held by the whole population of Central America. This evidence we find amply revealed in the fact that the internecine war, between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, which had been waged with so much bitterness for the last two years, was immediately brought to a close by his advent on their shores, and all their differences adjusted by a treaty of boundary and alliance; and yet this man claims to be their liberator and regenerator!

As a soldier I believe that those who have served with him, and I have seen and conversed with many of them, claim for him no other qualities than personal bravery. This is the almost universal attribute of our people; its absence is the very rare exception to a general rule; but in the higher acceptance of soldiership, foresight, combination, distribution, and care of his troops, he had with him many superiors. In times of difficulty and danger, all looked to Henningsen for the head to plan, while Walker was only the hand to execute. So soon as his escape was effected, with the duplicity and heartlessness that has characterized all his actions, he assumes the tone of injured innocence, and reviles the man who had rescued him from certain captivity, and probably from an ignominious death. We have no authentic record of the number of American citizens who perished by the sword, disease, and famine, in this second expedition; but I have seen it estimated at between two and three thousand. If one may believe his boasts, thrice that number of Central Americans may be counted as his victims. No sooner has he set foot on his native land than he renews his machinations; but in the hope of lulling the vigilance of the national authorities, on the 29th day of September, 1857, he addresses to the Secretary of State a letter, of which I will read the concluding portion:

"So far as any violation, on my part, of the acts of Congress is concerned, I deny the charge with scorn and indignation. Having been received in the United States, when forced for a time to leave Nicaragua, I have, in all respects, been obedient to its laws. And permit me to assure you that I shall not so far forget my duty as an officer of Nicaragua as to violate the laws of the United States while enjoying the rites of hospitality within its limits."

I do not choose to stamp this declaration with the only epithet it deserves; but it is entirely in keeping with the assertion contained in his letter of 30th November to Commodore Paulding, that he was "engaged in what your Government admits to be a lawful undertaking." Immediately after giving this solemn assurance to the Secretary of State, he proceeded to New Orleans and there commenced his preparations for his third expedition. I can add nothing to the lucid exposition of this part of the case by the Senator from Maryland. The publication in the New Orleans papers the day after his departure of the names and rank of his officers and of the objects of his expedition; the false invoices and manifest of the lading of the Fashion; his detachment of fifty men at the mouth of the Colorado for the capture, by that detachment, of Fort Castillo; the immediate establishment of his camp on his landing at Punta Arenas; the arms, ammunition, and stores found there; the assumption of the pompous title of commander-in-chief of the army of Nicaragua, forgetting, for the moment, the pretension, which he has since renewed, of being the lawful President of that Republic; all show so conclusively the object and character of his expedition, that it were an idle waste of words to dwell upon them.

But we are not left to mere inference or newspaper statements to establish the fact of a military expedition having been set on foot within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, and of its having been carried on under the flag of the United States. Anderson and his men having abandoned Fort Castillo, surrendered themselves to our squadron, and were conveyed to Key West in the flag ship. Eight or ten of the men who were there examined as witnesses, declared that they were enlisted at New Orleans to serve under Walker, that they all understood that there was to be some fighting, that all their expenses were paid from the time of their enlistment until they were put on board of the Fashion, in Mobile bay, that after they had been at sea three or four days, a battalion of four companies, composed of about forty men each, was formed, with captains, lieutenants, and sergeants, and from that time the roll was regularly called, morning and evening, and rifles and bayonets, taken from the hold of the steamer, were distributed. The United States district judge, before whom the men were examined, thought it unnecessary to inquire into the question of jurisdiction as to what had occurred on the high seas, as there was sufficient testimony to show the setting on foot of a military expedition at New Orleans, and directed them to be conveyed thither for trial. I shall, in the course of my argument, show that in the absence of all proof of a violation of the statute at New Orleans or Mobile bay, the organization on the high seas, on board of a vessel carrying the American flag, was within the jurisdiction of the United States.

I concur entirely with that portion of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations which sustains the views of the President in his message of 7th of January, of his rights and duties under the act of 20th April, 1818, and asserts the legality of the instructions given to Commodore Paulding and Lieutenant Almy; but I go further, and maintain that the power to seize the Fashion and arrest Walker was not confined to the high seas, but might be lawfully exercised in the waters of Nicaragua; and this position is, I think, essential to the full vindication of the course of the Executive. Captain Chatard was deprived of his command for having failed to prevent the landing of Walker, who passed under the stern of the Saratoga, while that ship was at anchor in the harbor of San Juan. Paulding is declared to have committed a grave error in having captured him on the soil of Nicaragua. Something has been said of the inconsistency of censuring Chatard for having done too little, and Paulding for having done too much. I can see no ground for the charge; while I am free to confess that I think the President's language too exculpatory of Paulding, and would have preferred to see him at once directing his recall. Although I have a good opinion of his ability and efficiency as an officer, under ordinary circumstances, he has shown himself unequal to the delicate and responsible duties of his late command. I say his late command; for I understand that he, having been ordered home, has been relieved by Commodore McIntosh.

I will now proceed to show, as I hope, conclusively, that the Fashion might have been lawfully seized by Captain Chatard, and carried, with Walker and his armed followers, to Mobile. She sailed from Mobile with American papers, and under the American flag, on an illicit voyage. The public and private vessels of the United States carry their nationality with them wherever they go; they carry with them also their jurisdiction; and many of the most esteemed writers on national law consider them as an extension of the territory. Azuni says:

"Finding that the commanders of armed vessels exercise the rights of sovereignty, even to the infliction of the penalty of death, in the ports and harbors of another sovereign, many authors, Hubner among them, maintain that these vessels are to be considered as foreign territory."

The penalty of death, under the sentence of courts-martial, held on board of our ships of war in foreign ports, has, I believe, been more than once inflicted in those ports; and I doubt not that the Senator from Texas will recollect that, in the waters of the United States, and, if I mistake not, in the river Mississippi, several men were hanged on board of a Texan ship-of-war. The maritime high court of France, in the case of the Sardinian steam-packet Carlo Alberto, August 6, 1832, held that "the flag of the sovereign is the sign of the nationality of a vessel; and, by the law of nations, it carries with itself its nationality and its sovereignty. Every vessel, therefore, sailing under the lawful authority of a Power is reputed to be a continuation of the territory of that Power." And in a supplementary decision in the same case, September 7, 1832, the court further held that "a vessel is a portion of the territory of the sovereign whose flag it bears." "The commanders of public armed vessels," says one of the best approved authorities on this head, "have a supervisory right over the merchant vessels riding in those ports where they themselves cast anchor." (De Rayneval, Droits de la Nature et des Gens.)

The jurisdiction of a nation over its public vessels, even in foreign ports, is absolute and unequalled; over its private vessels, the extent to which it may be exercised is not so well defined. The true principle seems to be, that in everything not interfering with the public interests or the rights of individual citizens or denizens of the nation in whose ports she may be, the jurisdiction is complete, and generally exclusive. This was held by the French Council of State, in 1806, in two cases. I quote from Wheaton, page 155:

"The first case was that of the American merchant vessel, the Newton, in the port of Antwerp, when the American consul and the local authorities both claimed exclusive jurisdiction over an assault committed by one of the seamen belonging to the crew against another, in the vessel's boat. The second was that of another American vessel, the Sally, in the port of Marseilles, where exclusive jurisdiction was claimed both by the local tribunals and by the American consul, as to a severe wound inflicted by the mate on one of the seamen, in the alleged exercise of discipline over the crew. The Council of State pronounced against the jurisdiction of the local tribunals and authorities in both cases, and assigned the following reasons for its decisions:

"Considering that a neutral vessel cannot be indefinitely regarded as a neutral place, and that the protection granted to such vessels in the French ports cannot oust the territorial jurisdiction, so far as respects the public interests of the State; that, consequently, a neutral vessel admitted into the ports of the State is rightfully subject to the laws of the police of that place where she is received; that her officers and crew are also amenable to the tribunals of the country for offenses and torts committed by them, even on board the vessel, against other persons than those belonging to the same, as well as for civil contracts made with them; but that, in respect to offenses and torts committed on board the vessel, by one of the officers and crew against another, the rights of the neutral Power ought to be respected, as exclusively concerning the internal discipline of the vessel, in which the local authorities ought not to interfere, unless their protection is demanded, or the peace and tranquility of the port is disturbed; the Council of State is of opinion that this distinction, indicated in the report of the Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, and conformable to usage, is the only rule proper to be adopted in respect to this matter; and applying this doctrine to the specific cases in which the consuls of the United States have claimed jurisdiction; considering that one of these cases was that of an assault committed in the boat of the American ship Newton, by one of the crew upon another, and the other case was that of a severe wound inflicted by the mate of the American ship Sally, upon one of the seamen, for having made use of the boat without leave; is of opinion that the jurisdiction claimed by the American consuls ought to be allowed, and the French tribunals prohibited from taking cognizance of these cases."

But we have, by our own statutes, an express recognition of the principle for which I contend. The African slave trade never was considered, and it is not now considered, contrary to the law of nations. It was not only tolerated, but also encouraged, by the whole civilized world, until expressly prohibited by several nations to its own citizens; and when now carried on, under any flag, the ships of war of other nations can only interfere with it by authority of express treaty stipulations. Our first prohibitory act, passed 22d March, 1794, only applied to the traffic to foreign countries. The fourth section of the amendatory act of 4th January, 1804, declares that it shall be lawful for any of the commissioned vessels of the United States to seize and take any vessels engaged in carrying on business or traffic contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act, and to apprehend and convey every person found on board of such vessel, being of the officers and crew thereof, to the civil authority in some one of the districts thereof, to be proceeded against in due course of law. Here there is no limitation of place of seizure. The act of 3d March, 1819, authorizes the President, "whenever he shall deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to be employed to cruise on any of the coasts of the United States or territories thereof, or of the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, when he may judge attempts may be made to carry on the slave trade by citizens or residents; and to instruct and direct the commanders of all armed vessels of the United States to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found, engaged in the slave trade; and to cause to be apprehended and taken into custody every person found on board, being of the officers or crew thereof, and convey them to the civil authorities of the United States, to be proceeded against in due course of law in some of the districts thereof."

Under this act, our ships of war have repeatedly seized, in the bays and rivers of Africa, American vessels engaged in the slave trade, and sent them to the United States, where they have been condemned. No one has ever dreamed of invoking the law of nations to protect the vessels or their crews. It will be observed that, under these laws, the nationality of an officer or seaman will not protect him from punishment; it is, for the time, merged in that of the flag under which he sails.

It is clear, that whether Walker had renounced his allegiance to the United States or not, whether he was or was not a citizen of Nicaragua, whether those who accompanied him were or were not American citizens, whether they had or had not, technically, organized as a military force before leaving the waters of the United States, is entirely immaterial; the offense of carrying on a military expedition was a continuous one from the moment the Fashion received on board the arms for these peaceful emigrants, in Mobile bay. The facts I have before stated afford sufficient evidence of the purpose for which those men embarked; but we have proof of the military organization—the most positive and direct—in the testimony of some of them, taken at Key West.

Captain Chatard, then, failed in his duty, in not preventing the Fashion from landing Walker and his associates; and I should not have been much disposed to blame him, if, in hot pursuit, as soon as he discovered the character and objects of the men who had disembarked from her, he had arrested them; but the landing was effected on the 25th November; whilst the arrest was not made until the 8th December. Ample time had been afforded to the Nicaraguan authorities to invoke the protection of our squadron. Had they done so, Commodore Paulding would have been fully justified in arresting Walker; their silence would seem to authorize the inference that they preferred to deal with him themselves. As it is, it would appear that Paulding's action was taken, rather under the irritation produced by Walker's correspondence, than from any mature and well-considered judgment of his rights and duties on general principles, and the instructions of his Government.

But these questions are all of very subordinate importance when compared with the policy of our neutrality laws which, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will now proceed to examine with as much brevity as its great importance will admit. While I think the policy of these laws, not only sound but indispensable for the preservation of our peaceful relations with foreign Powers, I by no means recognize the position, generally assumed, that they do no more than vindicate well-established principles of international law. They go much further; they deprive our Government of the faculty of doing that which all writers admit to be strictly consistent with neutrality—the granting to belligerents equal facilities, within our territory, for the enlistment of troops and fitting out of armed vessels within our territorial limits. There has been a prevailing error on this subject, in the public mind, from considering the statutory provisions of Great Britain and of the United States, the foreign enlistment bill, and our laws of 1794 and 1818, as merely providing specific penalties for acts which before had been admitted to be violations of the law of nations. So far from this being the case, it has never been considered a violation of neutrality on the part of any nation to permit belligerents to enlist troops within its jurisdiction, unless the permission were granted to one of the belligerents exclusively. Vattel says, book 3, chapter 7, paragraph 110:

"The Switzers grant levies of troops to whom they please; and no Power has hitherto thought fit to quarrel with them on that head. It must, however, be owned, that if those levies were considerable, and constituted the principal strength of my enemy, while, without any substantial reason being alleged, I were absolutely refused all levies whatever, I should have just cause to consider that nation as league with my enemy; and in this case, the care of my own safety would authorize me to treat her as such."

Paragraph 118:
"A neutral nation preserves, towards both belligerent powers, the several relations which nature has instituted between nations."

therefore, as far as the public welfare will permit, equally to allow the subjects of both parties to visit her territories on business, and there to purchase provisions, horses, and, in general, everything they stand in need of, unless she has, by a treaty of neutrality, promised to refuse to both parties such articles as are used in war. Amidst all the wars which disturb Europe, the Switzers preserve their territories in a state of neutrality. Every nation, indiscriminately, is allowed free access for the purchase of provisions, if the country has a surplus, and for that of horses, ammunition, and arms."

Paragraph 126:

"If the neutral State grants or refuses a passage to one of the parties at war, she ought, in like manner, to grant or refuse it to the other, unless a change of circumstances affords her substantial reasons for acting otherwise. Without such reasons, to grant to one party what she refuses to the other, would be a partial distinction, and a departure from the line of strict neutrality."

Grotius not only recognizes the correctness of this doctrine, but shows, by its existence in remote antiquity, that it is founded on simple rules of equity and good sense. He says, in his famous Treatise on War and Peace:

"It is the duty of neutrals to do nothing which may strengthen the side which has the worst cause, or which may impede the motions of him that is carrying on a just war, and in a doubtful case to act alike to both sides."

He quotes with approbation the declaration of the Corecyrans to the Athenians that it was the duty of the Athenians, if they would be neutral, either to prevent the Corinthians from raising soldiers in Attica, or to allow them to do so.

Bynkerschoeck argues at great length the question whether it is lawful to enlist men in the country of a friendly sovereign, and decides it affirmatively. He says:

"It is certain that if a prince prohibits his subjects from transferring their allegiance, and entering into the army or navy of another country, such sovereign cannot, with propriety, enlist them into his service; but when no such prohibition exists, (as is the case in most of the countries of Europe,) it is lawful, in my opinion, for the subject to abandon his country, migrate into another, and then serve his new sovereign in a military capacity."

"If, therefore, our subjects, whose assistance we do not want in time of war, and who are not prevented by any law from transferring their allegiance, may lawfully hire out their military services to a friendly prince, why may not, also, that friendly prince enlist soldiers in the territory of a friendly nation? Why should it not be equally lawful to contract for the hiring of soldiers in the territory of a friend as to make any other contract, and carry on any kind of trade?" "I am of opinion, therefore, that the same law which obtains as to the purchase of implements of war, must apply in like manner to the enlistment of soldiers in the territory of a friendly nation, unless it should be expressly stipulated otherwise between the two sovereigns."

He states a case which is peculiarly apposite in this connection:

"A difference took place in the year 1666 between the States General (of Holland) and the Governor General of the Spanish Netherlands. The States complained to him that the Bishop of Munster, with whom they were at war, had enlisted soldiers in the Spanish territories in the Low Countries. The Governor answered that he had not authorized him so to do, but that if he had, there was nothing to prevent him, as Spain was neutral in the war; and that the States General might exercise the same right if they pleased."

Martens says:

"Every State has a right to give liberty to raise troops in its dominions, and may grant to one State what it refuses to another, in war or peace, without infringing its neutrality."

His position has a sort of tacit sanction in many of our treaties. We have frequently stipulated that our citizens should not engage in war on the ocean against the Powers with whom we have made treaties; but I think that I may safely assert that we have never, but once, bound ourselves to prevent enlistment for service on land. The exception to which I refer is to be found in the twenty-first article of the treaty made by Mr. Jay with Great Britain, on the 19th November, 1794; but this article, among others, was expressly limited to twelve years, and has never been renewed or revived.

The first treaty we find on this subject is that with the Netherlands in 1782. It establishes that citizens of neither party shall take commissions or letters of marque for arming any ships, from any prince or State with which the other is at war. The same provision is found in the treaty with Sweden, in 1783, and in that with Prussia, of 1785; and in many others that it would be tedious to enumerate. The last cited treaty has an additional clause, which gives, by implication, the right for which I contend. It is in these words:

"Nor shall either party hire, lend, or give any part of their naval or military force to the enemy of the other, to aid them offensively or defensively against that other."

In the interpretation of public treaties, as well as in private contracts, this rule is recognized—expressio unius, exclusio alterius. The national force could not be employed, but individual action is not restrained. We then occupy this unfavorable position: while all nations may, without violation of neutrality, permit enlistments within their territory, for purposes hostile to us, we have deliberately tied our own hands and voluntarily deprived ourselves of one of the most efficient and legitimate means of carrying out our foreign policy.

I might present a thousand examples of the armed intervention of organized bands of citizens of a neutral State, in the wars between belligerent nations, or in the civil wars of Europe and America, and this without being considered as a casus belli with the Power whose citizens had thus intervened. Switzerland has at all times exercised this privilege, in permitting entire regiments and brigades to be enlisted within her territory for the service of foreign belligerent States; and the several cantons have frequently had their citizens regularly organized in the ranks of both the contending parties. Elizabeth permitted troops to be raised in England for the assistance of the people of the Netherlands, in their contest with Spain, although she was then at peace with that Power, because they were absolved from their allegiance, and free to choose their own Government. Charles I. authorized six thousand men to be enlisted for Gustavus Adolphus; and Major Dalgetty, immortalized by the author of Waverley, was but the type of hundreds of soldiers of fortune, who, in those days, lent their swords to the sovereign whose cause they espoused, either from political or religious sympathies, or because he offered the largest stipend. Far from being a cause of reproach, service in foreign wars was considered a graceful complement of the education of a gentleman; and in time of peace at home young men were encouraged to acquire military knowledge and experience wherever the hardest blows were to be exchanged. During the protracted struggle between Spain and her revolted colonies on this continent, several thousand men were raised in England to aid the revolutionists. An entire legion, commanded by General Devereaux, completely organized, armed and equipped, sailed from England; and, although its destination was proclaimed to all the world, met with no interruption from the Government. General Evans, then a member of Parliament from Westminster, and an officer of the British army, raised from five to six thousand troops in England, organized them under the title of the British Legion, and played a distinguished part in the Carlist war; he retained his commission and his seat in Parliament, and very many of his officers held commissions in the British army, and regularly received their half pay during the whole term of their service in Spain. Sir Robert Wilson was one of them, and at the same time held his seat in Parliament.

During the Greek war of independence, and after the passage of our neutrality laws, levies of troops and contributions of money were openly made both in England and the United States. Two frigates were built in New York for the Greeks; and the fund for equipping them falling short, one of them was purchased by our Government—and this under authority of act of Congress—to enable the other to be dispatched. In 1832, Captain Sartorius, of the British Navy, was made a Portuguese admiral, and openly fitted out a considerable squadron, officered principally by gentlemen holding commissions in the British navy, and manned by British subjects, for the service of Don Pedro, in the war against Don Miguel. He was afterwards replaced by Charles Napier, then a captain in the British navy, and since commanding the Baltic fleet in the war with Russia. Miguel's fleet was captured by him. A large land force, also recruited in England, took part in the war, under Sir Moilly Doyle, M. P. Lord Lansdowne said, in the debate on the foreign enlistment bill, June, 1819:

"All history would bear him witness in asserting that this was the first attempt made to establish the principle, that the subject of one State could not, privately and individually, assist those of another, where their respective potentates were not at war. He would venture to declare, that, for the last four centuries, and down to 1787, when the Netherlands resisted Joseph II., there never was a period in which British subjects were not engaged in giving this succor, as individuals, to other States; and he denied any man to show him in what instance any Government had interfered to prevent them, in the manner now proposed. The active interference of British subjects in the service of foreign States, was, therefore, not inconsistent with the doctrines of neutrality."

Lord Althorpe said, on the 16th April, 1823:

"It was to be remarked, that until 1819, when this foreign enlistment bill was passed, excepting as far as related to the statutes of George II., it had been considered that England might be strictly neutral without such a law; and those who now supported it must contend, that, from the Norman conquest downwards, she had, in fact, maintained no real neutrality between the contending parties."

But we have seen that England, whenever it suits her policy, not only authorizes but encourages her subjects to take part in foreign wars. She twice or thrice suspended the execution of the foreign enlistment law, and will do so again, whenever a sufficient motive offers. We alone have adopted the suicidal policy of so manacled ourselves that a law-abiding Executive cannot free us from our self-imposed fetters, although the best interests of the country may demand it.

The act, then, of April, 1818, is not an enforcement of the law of nations, but it is a restraint upon what, without it, would have been lawful and, in many instances, meritorious action of our citizens. The only really free representative governments of the world have thought proper to pass laws preventing the levying of armed bodies of men within their territory for the purpose of waging war against States with which they are at peace. Why? Because in these countries, in the absence of such laws, the Executive would be without power to prevent the fitting out of any expedition, however much its objects might conflict with the interests of the nation or the policy of the Government. These expeditions, although in themselves no violation of neutrality, where equal liberty is afforded to both belligerent parties to enlist men and purchase munitions of war, are certain to lead at once to acrimonious discussions and ultimately to terminate in war, where the party suffering by them is in a condition to avenge itself. Neutrality consists in affording no greater advantage to one party than the other. There are many circumstances in which, although on paper either belligerent may have the right to levy troops in a neutral country, in reality but one only can profit by it. The late war between Great Britain and France on one side, and Russia on the other, affords a striking example. The allies had complete command of the ocean, and could have transported any number of men, enlisted in the United States, without let or hinderance, to the Crimea; the Russians could not have conveyed a man or a munition of war to the relief of Sebastopol. Our neutrality would, in that case, had we permitted enlistment, have only been nominal, and Russia would have had just cause to complain of our conduct. To this danger we should have been exposed had not the laws of 1794 and 1818 been on our statute-books. The continental Governments of Europe have no occasion for such legislation; because, with them the executive power can always control the movements of its citizens. In Great Britain, the Queen, in council, can always suspend the operation of the foreign enlistment bill, or prevent the shipment of arms, ammunition, or other military stores and equipments. This power I desire to confer upon the President when Congress is not in session. I do not attempt to conceal that it is a very grave, perhaps, in the hands of an indiscreet or unscrupulous man, a dangerous one; but it is to be exercised under all the high responsibilities that attach to the Chief Magistrate; and it is useless to disguise that, although the war-making power is given by the Constitution to Congress, any President can so conduct our foreign relations that Congress will have but to choose the alternative of sustaining him or disgracing the country in the eyes of the world. Besides, although my resolution is couched in general terms, and indicates no such limitation, I do not desire to confer on the President the power to suspend the laws, except in cases where actual war exists between the Powers, in reference to which the suspension is to operate, or when a civil war (and by this I do not mean a mere commotion or rebellion) shall have broken out in a foreign State, or its colonies. When I made, four years since, a movement for the suspension of our neutrality laws, I believed, as I now believe, that a large majority of the people of Cuba was prepared to make a vigorous effort to throw off the yoke of their transatlantic oppressors, and, so far as my influence or councils could be useful, I was willing to aid them. I believed then, as I now believe, that a hostile feeling towards us then existed with the Governments of France and Great Britain, and that they desired to Africanize Cuba. I avail myself, gladly, of the occasion to say that such, I am satisfied, is not now the feeling of these Governments. Besides this, the people of Cuba, although still desirous of peaceful annexation, are not willing to run the risk of civil war and servile insurrection, to become members of our Confederacy. Public policy must accommodate itself to circumstances, and any attempt to obtain Cuba, except by negotiation, should, in my opinion, now be abandoned. But should Spain be rash enough to invade Mexico, with the purpose of establishing a despotic government there under the name of Santa Anna as dictator, or under any other name or title; then I think that our citizens should be permitted to take part in the contest. I wish this to be done legally. All the power of the Government cannot restrain them from doing it, and there should be no law on our statute-book that cannot be enforced. There are many confingencies, about which I do not choose to speculate, where the interests of the country would clearly call for the suspension of our neutrality laws; and if this power be not given to the President, under such restrictions as the wisdom of Congress may suggest, I am not prepared to say that I would not prefer to abolish them altogether, excepting so far as they may be necessary to carry out our treaty stipulations, and these, as I have before remarked, only apply to the fitting out of armed vessels. I have little hope of the passage of such a law as I have suggested. I have no pride of opinion on the subject; and if I fail, shall be satisfied with the conviction that I have done my duty in calling the attention of the Senate and the country to the subject; and it may be proper to state, in conclusion, that in presenting and advocating my resolution, I speak only for myself, and act without concert or understanding with any one.

Mr. MASON. I desire that the subject shall retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, they adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

Mr. WADE. I hope we shall not adjourn over. There is a great deal of private business that ought to be attended to, and we have paid very little attention to it during this session. I think we ought to devote to-morrow to it. I think justice to private claimants demands that we should not adjourn over.

Mr. FESSENDEN and Mr. FOSTER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Clay, Crittenden, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Kennedy, King, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doollittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Foster, Harlan, Houston, Iversen, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pugh, Sidel, Wade, and Wilson—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWN. There is a remnant of the evening left, and I am desirous to dispose of the business of the District of Columbia. There are several bills which ought to be passed; and I ask the Senate now to consider them.

The motion was agreed to.

The first District bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 168) to relieve the corporation of Georgetown from the expense of making and repairing roads west of Rock creek.

Mr. BROWN. There is some controversy about that not yet settled. Let it be passed over.

The bill was passed over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society.

Mr. BROWN. There are some amendments to that bill pending not yet prepared. Let it be passed over.

The bill was passed over.

MECHANICS' LIENS.

The bill (S. No. 182) for the enforcement of mechanics' liens on buildings, &c., in the District of Columbia, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether I understood the reading of this bill correctly. I understood that it gives lien upon pastured cattle for six months. An individual who pastures cattle is to have a lien on the cattle for six months after the performance of his service. If I understand it correctly, it seems to me it would interfere very much indeed with the free sale and traffic in those articles. I should like to know whether I understand the bill correctly?

Mr. BROWN. I do not think there is any harm in it. When one man pastures cattle on another's ground, that man who is in possession of the land ought to have a lien on the cattle. That is my notion. This bill was in the code which was voted down by the citizens of this District some month or six weeks ago, but in all the controversy in the District over that code no citizen of the District ever objected to this portion. It was extracted from the code, and presented to the committee, and we were asked to have it enacted into a law. I have let it lie several weeks, and have had it published in the newspapers, so that everybody might see it, and no citizen of Washington has made an objection to it. On the contrary, my understanding, from very full and free communication with the people here is, that they are satisfied with it. If so, that is enough for me.

Mr. GREEN. If that is the provision of the bill it will not do at all. A lien on personal property not in possession, and of which there is no record, ought never to exist. The lien must follow the possession, or follow a record; and to say that because a man keeping a pound has allowed cattle to come into it for a certain length of time, he is to have a lien for six months after the cattle pass off, after the possession is parted with, will not do at all; it is certainly wrong. A common innkeeper ought to have a lien, so that the owner cannot take away his horse until he pays the pasturage. That is right; but if he chooses to part with the possession, and there is no record made of the fact, the innocent purchaser might be ruined so far as the value of that property is concerned. That is wrong.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from North Carolina will call my attention to the particular passage to which he objects I will attend to it. It is a very long bill.

Mr. BIGGS. Let the fifteenth section be read. The Clerk read as follows:

"Any person who shall depasture or feed any horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, or any other live stock, or bestow any labor, care, or attention upon the same, at the request of the owner or lawful possessor thereof, shall have a lien upon such property for his just and reasonable charges for the labor, care, and attention he has bestowed, and the food he has furnished; and he may retain the possession of such property until such charges are paid."

Mr. GREEN. That is right. It is not what I thought.

Mr. BIGGS. But there is something about six months. Let that be read.

The Clerk read:

"Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That if such just and reasonable charges be not paid within six months after the care, attention, and labor shall have been performed or bestowed, or the materials or food shall have been furnished, the person having such lien may proceed to sell, at public auction, the property mentioned in sections fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen of this act, or a part thereof, sufficient to pay such just and reasonable charges."

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. BIGGS. I understand that after the possession is changed, within six months after that, he may sell.

Mr. BROWN and others. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) The Chair thinks the bill provides for the retention of possession by the person and proceeding to sell after six months. The Senator will pardon the Chair for making a suggestion to him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia whether he knows of any precedent for such a provision as this authorizing liens upon cattle for pasturage?

Mr. BROWN. I am not much of a man for precedent, any way. I think the provision is right in itself, and if it was never done before, it ought to be done now. This is a world of progress. We are getting along very fast.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will simply say that the lien law, wherever it exists, is pretty difficult to administer; and unless there be precedent for introducing a provision of this kind, it will lead to a great deal of difficulty when it comes to be administered. Under this provision, if a man buys a cow, he has to look after the lien. I do not like the provision which gives a lien, perhaps, it may be, upon the cow of some poor widow, for pasturage. That is a mere matter of contract.

Mr. BIGGS. I do not understand the bill to bear the construction that is suggested by the Chair, or by the Senator from Mississippi. I read a portion of the fifteenth section: "shall have a lien upon such property for his just and reasonable charges;" and "he may retain the possession of such property until such charges are paid." That is one section. Nobody objects to that at all; but the next section provides "that if such just and reasonable charges be not paid within six months after the care, attention, and labor shall have been performed or bestowed," the party may sell the property. Of course, he has not possession then. He retains the possession after bestowing the care and labor—he has a lien; but if the money is not paid within six months after that care or labor shall have been performed or bestowed, the lien continues, and he may proceed to sell the property at public auction. It seems to me this provides for a lien after the possession has been parted with for six months.

Mr. BROWN. There is nothing new in that provision. Everybody knows that every innkeeper has a right to retain a horse until the charges are paid; but if the horse passes out of his possession he loses his lien. Just so here.

Mr. BIGGS. This provides for it for six months.

Mr. BROWN. If the property is in his possession all the time; but if he loses his possession, of course he loses his lien.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The difference between this case and that mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi is, that the inn-keeper is bound to keep the horse, he is under a legal obligation to do it, but here you extend a lien to a matter of contract. To extend it in this way, I think, would be improper.

Mr. BROWN. I really do not see anything wrong in it.

Mr. CLARK. The objection I have is, that you oblige a man to keep the property too long by obliging him to keep it six months before he can sell. Sometimes the property would eat itself out in that time. The sale should be after reasonable notice to pay the charges. I move to strike out the section in regard to sale, the sixteenth section.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senate will allow the people here to have such laws as they want for themselves. I repeat again, that this bill has undergone the closest and most rigid scrutiny, and no citizen of the District has ever made the slightest objection to it. It was published, I say again, in their printed code of laws, underwent a close scrutiny, has been printed by order of Congress, has been in all the newspapers, and no citizen of the District has ever once whispered to me that there was anything wrong about it. I have kept it back five or six weeks, waiting to see whether anybody would object to it. If it satisfies the people here, I think it ought to satisfy us. It does not concern us in any way, so far as I know, or concern our home constituencies. If it pleases the people here, why not let it pass?

Mr. CLARK. I am entirely willing that the people of the District shall have such laws as they desire, if they are reasonable laws, and such as Congress ought to pass. If I felt assured that the people of the District knew that this bill was before the Senate, and assented to it, I certainly would not object; but the fear I have is that the people may not know what is here. I have no assurance that twenty men, forty men, or fifty men in all this District have examined this provision, and know its operation. We are guardians for the people of the District in the passage of laws, and I do not feel disposed to cast off that guardianship, and say that the people want this when there is no evidence that they do want it, or have examined it. If the Senator can assure me that the people of the District have had their attention called to it, and do not object to it, I shall be willing that it shall stand.

Mr. BROWN. I have not carried the bill around to everybody, but it has been published, as I have said before; it has been canvassed here in a public election; it has been printed in the newspapers, and everybody certainly has had a chance to see it. Being entitled a bill to secure mechanics' liens upon houses and lots, it was just one of those things most likely of all others to attract the attention of all. It concerned everybody; it concerned mechanics; it concerned common laborers; it concerned men of capital. I do not know that this precise section is acceptable, but I know the people of the District have had ample opportunity of complaining of it if they did not like it. If I had had my attention called to it by anybody in the District who desired it to be changed, I might consent to have it changed; but I did not draw the bill, I am free to say. It was taken bodily from the code, extracted at the instance of certain parties here. It was brought in because I was assured it was acceptable and very desirable.

Mr. CLARK. I should certainly be against this whole proposition if I followed the will of the people of this District as manifested by their vote, because I understand this bill to have been in the code, and the code was voted down. I do not know what evidence I have to guide me that the people of this District prefer this bill, and if it had stood separate, would have voted for it, and yet voted down the rest of the code. If it has been brought before the people of the District in any such way that the Senator can assure me that it was acceptable to them, I will withdraw the motion to amend.

Mr. BROWN. I will ask the whole Senate if anybody has ever heard a complaint against this bill? Has the Senator himself?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; I will say freely that I did not know the bill was here.

Mr. BROWN. I do not know of any way of informing Senators that bills are here, except by publishing them and putting them on their tables.

Mr. CLARK. It was reported at some time in the regular way. My attention might have been called to something else. I might not have been in my seat. At any rate, I did not understand it; but when the bill is read here in extenso, from the beginning to the end, and a discussion is had, it attracts notice. I do not know that I should have noticed this bill, if my attention had not been called to it by the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina. Now, when my attention is called to it, I am certainly opposed to this provision; but if I could feel assured that when the attention of the people of the District was called to it, they would not be opposed to it, I would suffer it to pass entirely.

On the motion to strike out the section, there were ayes thirteen.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for the yeas and nays. Is it on the section giving the lien, or on the section that speaks of the remedy to enforce the lien?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section applying to the remedy.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that I do not know but that this section may be amended so as to make it desirable to retain it, and if it can be passed over until we can examine it and see if we cannot make something out of the clause, I will withdraw the motion, or not press it.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to passing the bill by for the present, though I know there is an anxiety among mechanics and builders to have the bill passed.

Mr. CLARK. I will say that I think there should be a reasonable time for selling the property, and the person who has bestowed labor ought to have a way of perfecting his lien.

Mr. BROWN. I hope this debate to-day will be an advertisement to all Washington that this bill is here, and if it comes up again I hope some one will be able to state an objection to it in an authentic form, if there is any.

Mr. PUGH. I propose to state an objection now, if the yeas and nays are to be taken. I object to all these sections, after the thirteenth, and I think the first thirteen want specific amendments.

Mr. BROWN. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. PUGH. Allow me a moment. As the Senator wishes to hear the objections, I prefer to state mine now. ["No."]

Mr. BROWN. I do not care about objections. If the bill suits the people of the District, I am for it; if not, not.

Mr. PUGH. I think the bill ought to be amended. I object to being committed to it.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution adopted on the 8th ultimo, calling for information as to the cancellation of certain entries in the Plattsburg land district, in Missouri; which, on motion of Mr. GREEN, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TELEGRAPH TO UTAH.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 211) to facilitate communication with the army in Utah, for the purpose of making it the special order at half past twelve o'clock on Monday.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to inquire whether that bill will on Monday take precedence of other special orders; for instance, the Pacific railroad bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that he thinks the decisions which have been made by the permanent Presiding Officer of this body are such that, when one o'clock arrives, the bill would be superseded by an older special order.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I must object to making it the special order until we dispose of the appropriation bill which was up to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think this will take up much time any how; and, if any action is had on it at this session, it ought to be had immediately. I shall not press it so as to interfere with any of the Senator's bills. I think we can take it up on Monday morning, and settle it in a few minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. If the gentleman will agree to waive it at one o'clock, I have no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. At one o'clock it will be laid aside for the other special orders.

Mr. HUNTER. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The bill was made the special order for Monday at half past twelve o'clock.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. BROWN. The next bill on the Calendar is one for the benefit of the public schools of the city of Washington. I hope the Senate will pass that without difficulty.

The bill (S. No. 191) for the benefit of the public schools in the city of Washington, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. We have not a quorum here. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 8, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. D. BALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WASHINGTON AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. DODD. I ask to have taken up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 232, in order that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that an amendment, which I desire to offer to it, may be printed and referred with it.

There being no objection, Senate bill No. 232, to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of persons and property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that it be made a special order, with the bill already there.

It was so ordered.

Mr. DODD. I now ask that my amendment be printed, and referred with the bill.

It was so ordered.

Mr. GOODE. In connection with this subject, I desire to give notice that I will ask to have the bill taken up and considered, immediately after the Kansas bill shall have been disposed of.

NATIONAL FOUNDERY.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to introduce a bill to establish a national foundery, for the fabrication of cannon for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States, in order to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A MEMBER. At what point is it to be established?

Mr. FAULKNER. There is no point indicated.

Mr. CURTIS. I object.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FAULKNER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] withdraws his objection to the introduction of my bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] calls for the regular order of business.

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection for a moment in order to have this bill introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as to-morrow is fixed for the consideration of that subject.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not want any more armories.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is on agreeing to the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to recommit House bill No. 306 to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in separate bills the items for deficiencies in the appropriations for each head of expenditure for the service of the present fiscal year, and in another bill all appropriations designed for the service of the next fiscal year, and also with instructions to inquire what further legislation is necessary to restore to Congress an efficient control over the expenses of the Government.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BURNETT. That carries the bill with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion will carry the bill with it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well. I insist on my motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that the motion to lay the bill on the table is in order; but not the motion to lay on the table a proposition dependent upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of that opinion. In the early part of the session the Chair entertained a motion, made by the gentleman from Georgia, to lay an amendment upon the table. The Chair subsequently examined the matter, and could find no precedent for it. The Chair is of opinion that he erred in entertaining the motion, and that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois must be modified so as to lay the bill on the table. The Chair will so receive it.

Mr. DEAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 143; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bratton, Burdett, Burroughs, Clawson, Clemons, Comins, Darnall, Dawes, Dean, Fenton, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Haskin, Hoard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Palmer, Pettit, Potter, Robbins, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Ellihu B. Washburne—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoock, Branch, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Corning, Covode, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Goode, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kelsey, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Milson, Montgomery, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stillworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Tripp, Underwood, Walton, Ward, Warren, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—143.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BOYCE asked leave to vote, he having been out of the Hall when his name was called.

Mr. DEAN objected.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, asked the same privilege.

Mr. DEAN objected.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut, asked the same privilege.

Mr. DEAN objected.

Mr. GROESBECK asked the same privilege.

Mr. DEAN objected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, stated that if he had been in the Hall when his name was called, he would have voted "no."

The question recurred on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that the bill and amendments be reported to the House, with a recommendation to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in separate bills the items for deficiencies in the appropriation for each head of expenditure for the services of the present fiscal year, and in another bill all appropriations designed for the service of the next fiscal year; and also, with instructions to inquire what further legislation is necessary to restore to Congress an efficient control over the expenses of the Government.

Mr. LETCHER called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the Chair what would be the effect of voting down the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The question will then recur on the first amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and so on with all the amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. These instructions can be divided, can they not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HOUSTON. The division that I propose is to take the two first paragraphs, and vote upon them, and then have a separate vote on the last paragraph. Will the Chair look, and see whether they cannot be so divided?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will perceive that there can be no division of the motion to commit with instructions, because to allow a motion to be divided it is requisite that each branch of the resolution should be able to stand independently of the other.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of that; but I would have the Speaker to look into the resolution again.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to recommit fails, the gentleman will perceive there would be no proposition left.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Chair misapprehends me. I ask whether I cannot be permitted to have a division of the instructions, terminating with the second paragraph?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, for this very simple reason: If the motion to recommit and the first branch of the instructions should be voted down, what would become of the others?

Mr. HOUSTON. The others would be voted down too, as a matter of course.

The SPEAKER. They might or might not.

It would leave them there with instructions, without any motion to recommit.

Mr. GARNETT. I ask for the reading of the 78th rule, so as to show that the last branch of the instructions is a mere repetition of part of that rule.

The rule was read, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the state of the public debt or the revenue, and of the expenditures, and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriation of money, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments and the accountability of their officers."

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 101, nays 119; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Blair, Bonham, Bratton, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemons, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craig, Curry, Curtis, Darnall, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Robert B. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Kilgore, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Seales, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, William Smith, Stillworth, Stanton, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bliss, Bocoock, Boyce, Branch, Buffington, Burns, Campbell, Caskey, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McClay, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Reilly, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—119.

So the recommendation was not concurred in.

Pending the vote,

Mr. GILMAN stated that Mr. ABBOTT was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the recommendation was non-concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I stated yesterday in the House that those gentlemen who have opposed this bill on particular grounds should have an opportunity, if general consent was given, to take the yeas and nays on each one of the propositions that was objectionable to them. I hope now that there will be unanimous consent that the bill and the amendments be read, that those gentlemen can call for a vote on each particular item that they object to, and that the yeas and nays be taken on them.

Mr. STANTON. The House has voted down the recommendation to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report separate appropriations for the different fiscal years. I now move to lay the bill and amendments on the table, and on that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to move, now that the morning hour has expired, to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not commenced.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Then I had better make no motion till this is disposed of; and then I will make a motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The question was put on Mr. STANTON's motion, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, now, will the House give general consent to my proposition, which is to take up the bill, read it from the beginning to the close, and, as each paragraph is read, if any gentleman wants a separate vote upon it, let him call for it, and let the yeas and nays be ordered on it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object, unless it is in order. Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I suppose there is no objection to any amendment that has been proposed and adopted in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Let a vote be taken, by common consent, on the whole of them.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I have kept my promise, and stand right before the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. How long will this business be likely to last? There are some of us who are anxious to take up the regular order of business, having business engagements which will require our absence during the latter part of the day.

The SPEAKER. The House is executing the regular order of business which takes precedence over all other business.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I thought the Kansas bill was to be taken up at one o'clock.

The SPEAKER. It can be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I do not propose to interfere with that matter at all. I have no charge of any arrangements for this side of the House; but it was understood yesterday that the bill would be taken up to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the regular order of business will be proceeded with. We shall consume more time in this discussion than it would take to pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to taking up the Kansas bill?

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were then read; and no one calling for a separate vote, they were adopted in gross.

Mr. FAULKNER. I thought there was to be some opportunity given to have a distinct vote upon the third section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objected to it.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] pledged me yesterday that there should be an opportunity of amending this third section.

Mr. LETCHER. That is the proposition I submitted to the House, but it was objected to.

Mr. CLEMENS. You agreed, yesterday, to give me the opportunity.

Mr. LETCHER. How can I do so? Your own friends moved the previous question. I did not.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw the objection.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to call the attention of the House to the quarter from which the objection comes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Virginia yesterday insisted on the demand for the previous question, and I ask now that the regular order may be executed.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read a third time.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 106, nays 124; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adair, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barndollar, Bennett, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Boyce, Bryan, Burns, Campbell, Caskey, Caspman, John B. Clark, John Cochran, Cockrell, Coning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dammick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Eastis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garrett, Gilles, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, H. H. Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Howard, Hughes, Hoyer, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glaney Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Keller, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macfar, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ricard, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scott, Searing, Seward, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craige, Curry, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Houston, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Morgan Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Peut, Peyton, Pike, Potter, Pottier, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Scales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, William Smith, Spinner, Stailworth, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—124.

So the bill was rejected.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. BRANCH stated that he voted "no," for the purpose of moving to reconsider.

NEW JERSEY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a question of privilege. On yesterday the resolutions from the State of New Jersey proposing a grant of land for the purpose of establishing colleges, &c., were referred to the Committee on Agriculture. That whole question has been before the Committee on Public Lands for some time, and they now have it under consideration. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture, for the purpose of having them referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I think that is the proper committee to have charge of the subject, and I do not think the rules of the House contemplated that petitions and resolutions referring to the same subject should be divided among the different committees of the House.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Upon a division on the motion to lay on the table, there were—yeas 101, nays 91.

Mr. COBB called for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. CRAIG, of North Carolina, and WALDRON, were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 100, nays 101.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to refer the joint resolutions to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolutions were accordingly referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were referred, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKER, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that we shall proceed to the consideration of the message from the Senate notifying us that it had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the Senate bill for the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union.

There was no objection; and the message was taken up.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move that the House adhere to their amendment; and on that I call for the previous question.

Mr. BOCOCK. If the House agree to this motion, will not that agreement preclude all chance of settlement between the two Houses, unless the Senate gives way?

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the call for the previous question, to enable me to make a motion?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. It would afford me great pleasure to accommodate my friend from Indiana, but I must decline to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House recede. I think the motion takes precedence of that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained pending a demand for the previous question. If the gentleman's motion had been made before the call for the previous question, it would have taken precedence.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the Speaker to decide that the call for the previous question cuts off my motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. BOCOCK. The Chair has not answered my question. Does not a motion to adhere cut off all chance for a settlement of this question, unless the Senate gives way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it arises.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would inquire whether the Senate may not recede?

Mr. KEITT. I object to any debate.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I wish to ask a question as to the effect of the motion to adhere.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The tellers reported that there were one hundred and eighteen in the affirmative; which was a majority of the House.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The agreement yesterday was that the vote should be taken at this time, and I hope that agreement will be carried out.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLEMENS. I renew the demand.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope, as the yeas and nays were not taken on this, that they will not be taken on any question. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. BOCOCK. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adhere.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I wish to ask a question before I cast my vote.

Mr. GROW. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether, if this motion be voted down, it will not be in order to move to insist on the amendment of the House; and whether, if it be not voted down, it will be in order to move to insist; and whether, if the motion to adhere be agreed to, there can be a committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the motion to adhere be agreed to, it will cut off the motion to insist, of course.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If the Senate demands a committee of conference, it may be granted.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to ask a question for information. Does the Chair rule that if the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania prevails, the Senate cannot ask for a committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled either way upon the subject. He will decide questions as they arise.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I want to say—

Several Members. "Order."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I can wait until gentlemen stop their clamor.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. It is objected to by several gentlemen.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to ask a question for information.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 111; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace P. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Muscarello, Davis of Maryland, Davies, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Duffee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fulton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Harrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Board, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walhron, Walton, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—119.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockee, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewar, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Garrett, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Quincy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lunan, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Macloy, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—111.

So the House resolved to adhere to its amendment.

Pending the above call, Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, stated that he had paired off with Mr. Bowrie, who was absent, and that otherwise he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House resolved to adhere to its amendment; and also to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. BRANCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to reconsider the vote of the House of this morning by which the deficiency bill was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BRANCH. I believe I have the floor; and I desire to give notice that, if the vote shall be reconsidered, I propose to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 396 be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in lieu of it a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the support of the Army.

2. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the payment of officers and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the House of Representatives.

3. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for miscellaneous items.

4. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent fund of the House.

5. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department.

6. A bill making appropriations to pay extra compensation to clerks and other employees of the House, under resolutions of the last Congress; or to indemnify the late Clerk, if he has paid said compensation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I want to know in what way this resolution comes before the House?

The SPEAKER. As a part of the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does not the previous question operate upon the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The previous question exhausted itself when the result of the vote on the passage of the bill was announced.

Mr. BRANCH. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the appropriation bill which was rejected by the House this morning was rejected in consequence of there being single items in it that caused gentlemen to vote against it who were in favor of the main items of the bill.

The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia. [Mr. GARNETT,] which was also rejected this morning, I have reason to think was not satisfactory to the House because of a supposed difficulty in executing it. The resolution that I propose to offer, if this vote shall be reconsidered, avoids the difficulty that was alleged to exist in the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, by not going so much into details, but requiring the committee to report in each bill the items belonging to each department of public expenditure. I do not propose—as it was supposed that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia proposed—to require the committee to report a bill for each particular item of appropriation, but only that they shall include in one bill such items as are congruous to one another.

I am of the impression, sir, that if the Committee of Ways and Means should report to this House, under the instructions that would be given them by this resolution, a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the support of the Army, this House, in view of the fact that our army is now far beyond the frontiers, in the country of what must be regarded as the public enemy, that that army has spent the winter there, that it is short of supplies and can neither receive supplies, nor advance, nor recede, unless this House shall appropriate means to enable the Department to supply them—I say, in view of these facts I believe that this House would not fail to pass a bill to enable the Government to send forward those supplies.

Mr. GARNETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that the very objects designed by my resolution were identical with those which he states to be the objects of his resolution. I am glad that he has found language which expresses those objects more clearly than mine did, and I hope the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, if they really desire to pass the bill, will accept the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. LETCHER. One word, Mr. Speaker. Under the resolution which the gentleman from North Carolina proposes to introduce, six bills will have to be reported. How many of them he will consider deficiency bills I do not know. But I should be glad to know from him whether, when one deficiency bill came up for consideration, it would not be strictly in order to hang on any other deficiency to that by a vote of this House? What is to prevent it, sir? Is there any way of objecting to it? Here is a deficiency in the appropriations for the Army. This is a bill to provide not only for that, but for the deficiency in the Post Office Department, and for any other deficiencies that may exist in any department of the public service. Now, sir, when we bring in the first bill which the gentleman provides for—the one for the deficiency for the Army—why could not this deficiency for the Post Office be ingrafted upon it?

Mr. BRANCH. I think I can answer the gentleman from Virginia. I am not an adept in the rules of this House, but I believe there is a rule that requires that no bill pending before the House shall be amended by attaching to it any other bill pending before the House. That is one answer that I make to him. Another is, that if a majority of the House desire to attach it, then it is proven that a majority of this House are determined not to pass a bill to supply these deficiencies, and the test can as well be presented in that way as in any other as to whether the House is willing to pass a deficiency bill.

Mr. LETCHER. Would it not be strictly in order, when such a deficiency bill was brought in here, to move as an amendment to that bill a deficiency for the Post Office, recognized as such?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire an answer from the Chair?

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly, I do.

The SPEAKER. It is a question which the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would have to decide when the bill came up. But if the present occupant of the Chair was chairman of the Committee of the Whole, he would rule out of order any amendment not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. LETCHER. Would it not be germane to a deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER. Upon a different subject than that of the main body of the bill?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold not.

Mr. BRANCH. The gentleman from Virginia will perceive that the Committee of Ways and Means will be instructed by this resolution, if it shall pass the House, to present bills for all deficiencies that are alleged to exist. If the committee present a bill for supplying deficiencies for the Army, they are at the same time instructed to present a bill for supplying deficiencies for the Post Office Department, and the bill for the latter purpose cannot, as I understand, be attached by way of amendment to the former.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, I would suggest to him to modify his proposition, so as to recommit the bill, if reconsidered, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a deficiency bill confined strictly to deficiencies for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858.

Mr. BRANCH. I have done even better than is proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee. I propose to instruct the committee to report six deficiency bills instead of one. By the terms of the resolution they are required to be deficiency bills, and they can be nothing else than deficiency bills.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to this debate, on the ground that the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina is not before the House, and, therefore, cannot be debated.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is debatable. It opens the merits of the question contained within the bill; but the Chair thinks that a discussion of the special merits of the resolution which the gentleman proposes to submit is not in order.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman a question; whether the Committee of Ways and Means cannot report these bills without instructions? Why not let the bill remain as it is, defeated, and let the Committee of Ways and Means report as many bills as they choose? They can gather the idea of the House without instructions.

Mr. BRANCH. For the simple reason that I presume that a majority of the House desire to make these appropriations, or a portion of them. The Committee of Ways and Means may choose not to report any further bills; and I desire that this House shall explicitly instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report bills.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from North Carolina, with regard to the phraseology of this resolution in the sixth clause. I understand by the phraseology adopted there that the Committee of Ways and Means is instructed—

Mr. SEWARD. Is there anything before the House to amend? I object to debate.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am not debating the question, I am merely making a suggestion.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. CLEMENS. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to object to my making a suggestion?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes; I object to any amendment to that which does not exist.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I suppose it is in order for me to say that, in view of the fact that since the last meeting of Congress, and since Congress has had an opportunity to provide appropriations, war has sprung up within our own limits, and an army has been sent there by the Executive, in the exercise of a discretion vested in the Executive by law; this House, I presume, is not prepared to say that the army shall remain in the mountains of Utah, either to be cut to pieces by a wild set of fanatics, or starved for want of provisions. And, in particular, Mr. Speaker, I presume that this House will not suffer the army thus to be cut to pieces or starved for want of necessary supplies, in view of the fact that the War Department has made contracts and expended money to furnish these supplies, under the express authority given to that Department by the act of 1820.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CLEMENS. I object. Give the gentleman the benefit of his own philosophy.

Mr. SEWARD. I approve of the gentleman objecting.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I hope I will be allowed to proceed without further interruption. I have but a few words to say. I was going on to remark that there are items contained in this bill voted on by the House this morning, which, if the committee report in several bills as my resolution proposes, I will vote against. I think that that bill contains items for which Congress ought not to make appropriations, and if they were put in separate bills I would vote against one half of them at least. But there are items which ought not to be rejected. There are items there which every man in the House will feel and acknowledge the obligation of Congress to provide for.

I confess that I would have voted for that bill with great reluctance myself, as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means; but I would have taken it, even with the objectionable items in it, rather than reject the whole bill, and thus leave the army in Utah without the supplies necessary for its defense and subsistence. When these bills are reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, I imagine there are a great many gentlemen on this floor who, like myself, will vote against a portion of them, and in favor of a portion of them. I think that the Committee of Ways and Means, with all deference to that committee, would have done better in reporting in that shape in the outset, so as to give those who desire to vote for a portion an opportunity to do so, without voting for items which a majority do not approve.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry at that point. It is, whether he knows, in the history of Congress, that any such bills were ever reported in the manner that he suggests?

Mr. BRANCH. There is one thing which I have learned during my service in this House, and which has impressed me more forcibly than any other thing that I have learned, and that is, that if there is one single thing in the whole Government, in the executive department, in the legislative department, or in the judiciary department, which, above all other things, requires reformation, and which, above all other things, it is the peculiar duty of this House to reform, it is the practice of Congress in relation to the appropriation bills. I have seen enough since I have been here to satisfy me that the control which this House has over the expenditures of the Government, that the checks which the Representatives of the people are supposed to exercise over other departments of the Government, in reality amount to nothing at all.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire whether all the sums in this deficiency bill are not for expenses already incurred, and to discharge debts already incurred?

Mr. BRANCH. I understand not; but that a very large amount of these appropriations are for money that will be needed for debts and expenses to be incurred previous to the 30th of June next.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I wish to know whether he proposes by his resolution to divide that which is for deficiencies for the present fiscal year from that which is proposed to meet future expenses?

Mr. BRANCH. I do not propose by this resolution to get up an appropriation bill on our own hook—so to speak—in the House, but to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report bills to supply deficiencies.

Mr. CURTIS. Nothing else?

Mr. BRANCH. That is the terms of the resolution. To supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858; and nothing else but deficiencies.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that an additional appropriation is immediately necessary.

Mr. BRANCH. Then the gentleman will vote to reconsider in order that my resolution may be passed. I am told that these appropriations are necessary to carry on effectually the duties of the Government, and I desire that Congress shall make these appropriations. And yet, no gentleman on this floor is more convinced than I am that under different circumstances—under circumstances more favorable to calm deliberation—under circumstances when we would be less pressed by great public exigencies, it is the duty of the House to look into these appropriations, to look into the manner in which moneys are expended, and to look into the degree of responsibility which attaches to the Executive in the expenditure of moneys, and in the sending of estimates to this House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I desire to state, if the gentleman from North Carolina will allow me, the reasons which induced me to vote for the defeat of this bill. My object was to call public attention to the Executive under existing circumstances, and that its action should be rebuked. But it is my purpose to vote for the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to reconsider, and to vote for a bill to supply the means for the support of the Army. I desire to extricate the bill from its present position, and to appropriate such an amount as the judgment of Congress may deem necessary.

Mr. BRANCH. I am very glad to hear that the gentleman from Louisiana will vote for my resolution. It is what I should have expected from the good sense of the gentleman, and I think the resolution will commend itself to the good sense of a majority of the House. Gentlemen say they will all vote for it, and I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. BRANCH. As the gentleman from Ohio is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I will withdraw for him if he will renew the demand, but for no other gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina, and I will occupy but little of the time of the House. I think the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina ought not to pass. I believe that the system adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this deficiency bill is correct. It is now proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] that the Committee of Ways and Means shall report, at this late period of the session, six new deficiency bills. Judging of what may take place by what has taken place in the past, it is reasonable to presume that it will be midsummer before, in the ordinary slow process of legislative machinery, we can succeed in passing the deficiency bills for the current fiscal year, without reaching the bills for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st of July.

Mr. BRANCH. I desire to say that it is my intention, if the vote rejecting the bill shall be reconsidered, to offer the resolution I have indicated, and to add at the end of it, power for the Committee of Ways and Means to report at any time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. These will be appropriation bills, and, under the rules of the House, they must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and we all know very well that when we go there to take up the bills, every possible subject will be discussed that members may see fit to speak upon, without reference to the merits of the bill before the committee. How has it been in reference to this bill itself? It has been under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for five or six weeks at least; and yet the merits of the bill were never touched until the last two or three days of the discussion. And we have now this most remarkable spectacle of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, after laboring for weeks to perfect the bill, and after having carried various amendments, at last coming into the House with a recommendation from the Committee of the Whole that it be sent back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the instructions, in substance, which the gentleman from North Carolina now proposes again to submit. In the House, the instructions and the bill are defeated. The gentleman from North Carolina now intimates that the reason why he would so instruct the Committee of Ways and Means, is, that the House cannot trust that committee without instructions.

Mr. BRANCH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I used no such language.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BRANCH. No. I said that the Committee of Ways and Means might not choose to report any other bills, while the majority of the House, in my opinion, wishes that they should be reported. I therefore proposed to send the bill back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to that effect.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not hear distinctly what the gentleman said; but so understood him.

The objection that this is not a deficiency bill I think is improperly taken. It is quite true that some of the money provided for in the bill has not been actually expended; but the Committee of Ways and Means had good reason to believe that it would all be wanted before the expiration of the present fiscal year, because of exigencies which have arisen which could not be foreseen. Therefore it is a deficiency bill, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current fiscal year, and, as such, in my opinion, ought to pass.

Mr. Speaker, if the Committee of Ways and Means are to be required to separate appropriation bills and classify them as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, there would be in the course of the session perhaps eighty or one hundred appropriation bills to be considered.

During the last Congress, for the purpose of relieving the embarrassments of legislation, the Committee of Ways and Means did separate the old civil and diplomatic bill into three parts; and if the separation is to be carried further, and to be followed out in deficiency bills, it will require the entire time of Congress to act upon the bills reported from that committee alone. Other public and private bills must then be necessarily neglected.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to a question of order. I understood the Chair to rule that it was not in order to discuss the merits of my resolution, and I therefore refrained from discussing it, and confined my remarks to the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well, if the gentleman means, in good faith, to abandon his resolution, and to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected, with the purpose of putting it upon its passage; if he and the friends of the bill upon the Administration side will give any assurance that it is their purpose to put the bill upon its passage, and take the responsibility, I, as one of the members on this side of the House, am willing to vote for it, and take my share of the responsibility. I did vote for it this morning; but the gentleman and his party friends must not expect to shirk the responsibility. It is not very agreeable to us, on this side of the House, when we have voted to give an opposing Administration the means necessary for carrying on the Government, to be jeered and taunted with the charge that we are responsible for the public expenditures based upon the recommendation of their Executive Departments.

Mr. Speaker, I voted for this bill, not that I liked every part and parcel of it—

Mr. PHELPS. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to remark that he desired to see gentlemen on this side of the House take the responsibility; that if the members on this side would support this bill, the motion to reconsider would prevail, and the bill would be passed in its present form. I have not had time to examine the record which has been made, but I am informed that only twenty-seven members on the Democratic side voted with those who defeated the bill—only twenty-seven out of the large number of Democrats here. Then it would appear that the fault, if any, rests with the friends of the gentleman on the other side. I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that he will bring his friends on that side up to vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take no contract of that sort; I speak for no party here; I speak for myself only.

Mr. PHELPS. I only adverted to the state of facts as I understand them to exist.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take it that every member of the House will vote as his judgment dictates. I have voted for the bill, as I have already remarked, notwithstanding there were some items in it that I could not approve. I have voted in this House for very many appropriation bills for some nine years, and I do not believe that I have ever recorded my vote in favor of a single bill every item of which I approved. Sir, I do not believe if I were to remain here nine years more, and vote for appropriation bills, that I would be able to approve every item they might contain. In my judgment, when statesmen come to legislate for a great Government, such as ours, embracing so many sections and such diversified interests, they ought not to demand that every bill shall be so perfect that there could not be an i dotted or a t crossed without increasing their opposition. Each member ought to be willing to yield in minor matters for the common good. It is on that principle, and in that spirit, that I voted for the bill this morning; and it is in that spirit that I appeal to the gentlemen who are friends of the Administration which demands this appropriation of us, to vote for this bill.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman talks about responsibility for the defeat of this bill. Sir, I claim to be one of the friends of the Administration; but I claim, at the same time, the right to vote here as I think proper. I say that the responsibility for the defeat of the bill rests not on the majority of the House who do not like the bill in its present form, but on those who refused to permit it to be placed before us in such form that the majority would like to accept it.

Mr. LETCHER. With the permission of my friend from Ohio, I will say one word right here. The proposition was distinctly made, and the vote distinctly taken, on that matter which my colleague objects to in the third section, on a motion to strike it out. The motion was rejected in committee. Even then I told him, and told others in this House, that so far as that matter was concerned, when the bill came into the House for final action, I would give them the opportunity of having the yeas and nays on that section, and on the others that were objected to. Why was not that done? Why, sir, because he offered his resolution and moved the previous question, thereby depriving me of that privilege without unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I say, right here, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] refused to withdraw his call for the previous question, when, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I appealed to him to do so in order that his colleague of that committee [Mr. LETCHER] who had charge of the bill, might put it in such a position, under the rules, that a vote might be taken separately on the objectionable propositions referred to. The responsibility is, therefore, more particularly upon the distinguished friend of the Administration from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT,] than upon any other member.

Mr. GARNETT. I am ready to accept any responsibility which I have incurred to the Administration or to anybody else; and I will say to my colleague, that he knows very well that it is not to that particular item of the bill to which I, with other gentlemen, object. I ask why he did not report that item in a separate bill? Why, too, he did not put the civil and diplomatic portion of it in another bill, and the military part in another? Why did he not do this as it is done in the annual appropriation bills? Is it fair and right to ask members of the House to vote, in one bill, for things which they dislike, to get those which they like? Is it fair to ask them to accept good and bad alike? I know that his object was to defeat the proposition; I know the object of the gentleman is to defeat the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, which proposes to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, which is our organ, in order that it may report the bill in such a form as will express the will and suit the approbation of a majority of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. One word.

Mr. BRANCH. I object to this discussion. It is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I ask that the discussion be kept in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I trust that the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRANCH. I withdraw it.

Mr. LETCHER. What I want to say is this: the regular bill has been divided into three parts, so that objectionable portions might not be forced upon members of the House. When was that done? It was done in the last Congress; and up to that time all these appropriations had been reported in one bill. We divided it with doubts expressed here and in the other end of the Capitol, with respect to the propriety of that action.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] has commented on the action of the Committee of Ways and Means. I desire to invite his attention, and the attention of the House, to the action which was had in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union when this bill was under consideration. Every proposition to strike out any portion of it was voted down by a majority of the committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] moved to strike out so much as related to appropriations for the Army, and that was defeated by a large majority. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moved to strike out so much as proposes to defray the expenses of surveying the public lands in California, and that also was voted down by a large majority. Then the third section, on which the gentleman has commented so strongly, was not stricken out, a large majority voting against the motion. If the gentleman from Virginia was opposed to the bill, why did he not propose an amendment or a substitute, instead of dealing in speculations and abstract propositions of instruction to the committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARNETT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I must decline to yield the floor any further. I had no intention of getting up a family quarrel among our Democratic friends over this bill. I rose for the purpose of defining my own position in regard to it, and of making a suggestion or two.

Now, sir, it is important that this bill, in some form, should be passed and passed speedily. We have already provided for volunteer regiments for the protection of the frontier. It is time they were on the march. Some means—sinews of war—must be provided very speedily, or the whole arrangement prove a practical failure. Without, therefore, going further into the discussion, I express the opinion that the motion to reconsider ought to prevail and that the bill ought to be put upon its passage. I will favor a proposition of that kind, but will oppose a recommitment to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions.

Mr. GARNETT. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to state a matter of fact?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I always yield for such purposes.

Mr. DEAN. Is it in order?

The SPEAKER. Not if objected to.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. GARNETT. It is a personal explanation that I desire to make as to a question of fact.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman has a right to make it, if the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of course I yield to such an application.

Mr. GARNETT. I merely wish to say this, that I moved the previous question on my resolution; but when that resolution was voted down, then was the time that we could have offered amendments to the bill itself. And the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] if I mistake not, then called the previous question, and prevented the possibility of our doing so.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Virginia—

Mr. BRANCH. I object to any discussion between these gentlemen—

Mr. PHELPS. Let me make a statement in relation to the matter of fact. The previous question was called by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT,] which extended to the engrossment of the bill. Has the gentleman served here two sessions, and yet does not know that the previous question extends to the engrossment of the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to restore peace on the Democratic side of the House, and must decline to yield the floor longer.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] boasted that he was the friend of this Administration, and we all know that he is a very active supporter of it. I am opposed to the general policy of the Administration, but am nevertheless in favor now, as I have been hitherto, of giving to an Administration to which I am opposed all reasonable means for carrying on the Government. And whilst I will continue to oppose Mr. Buchanan's party policy, (when I think it wrong,) I will support the Government, and give by my vote, when it is necessary, fair appropriations to carry on every department of it, on the land or on the seas.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to bring this matter to a close, but will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BURNETT. I am one of those who voted against the bill. I, too, am a friend of this Administration. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] who reported the bill and has it in charge, seems to find fault with those of his party friends who voted against the bill, and says that it is not his fault that this bill was not amendable, when it came into the House. Grant it, sir; but here is the fault which I find with the Committee of Ways and Means—that they incorporated into this bill things which they confessed here themselves were not deficiencies. What are they? The two most objectionable features of the bill—the third section and the clause making an appropriation to enable Mr. Rives to pay the reporters for the Globe, were put into this bill, although it is conceded that they are not deficiencies. We have no chance to vote against them, and we were forced to vote for what we regarded as a violation of an express law passed by Congress, or else to vote against the whole bill. When you put that alternative to me, I will vote against the bill. I am as much in favor of giving the supplies necessary to carry on the operations in Utah, as any gentleman on this floor, and will vote as cheerfully for a bill for that purpose, as any other gentleman here.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LETCHER. A word just here. The gentleman from Kentucky says that he regards that third section as no deficiency, and that the Committee of Ways and Means had no business to put it in the bill. The money was voted, a part of these employes have been paid, and there is no money to pay the others. It does seem to me that that comes pretty near a deficiency at any rate, and near enough to be put in this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MASON. The President never signed a bill voting that money so as to make it a law.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BRANCH. I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I object now to any further discussion out of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not desire to go outside of the line of legitimate debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will interpose to prevent any further discussion out of order.

Mr. BRANCH. I hope the Chair will do it. I object to this discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand the proposition to be to reconsider the vote by which the bill was defeated, and that the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] is not before the House. I am discussing the motion to reconsider. Through courtesy I have yielded to others, who wander from the question. The resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina is not before us.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And it cannot, I presume, be brought before the House to-day except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not so certain of that. At the present stage of the proceedings the resolution cannot, as a matter of course, be brought before the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Chair is quite right, and to restore peace I move the previous question.

Mr. WARREN. The question will be simply on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was defeated?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be sustained, the effect will be to bring the House to a vote upon the question, "Shall the vote rejecting the bill be reconsidered?" If the House determines to reconsider that vote, the previous question will have exhausted itself. There will then be no question in order except on a motion to commit the bill, or "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CURTIS. Under those circumstances, I move that the House do now adjourn. It is evident that we cannot dispose of the bill to-day.

Mr. PHELPS. Let the previous question be seconded first.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I see a great many vacant seats here, and as members would like to have an opportunity of voting on the motion to reconsider, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 9, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. G. W. BASSETT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NAMES OF VESSELS CHANGED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 16, 1858, calling for information as to the number of vessels whose names have been changed under the act of March 5, 1856.

Mr. COMINS. I move that the communication be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so ordered.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the amendment of the House to the resolution of the Senate, (No. 4,) to extend the operation of an act approved July 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy;'" and also, that the President had announced to the Senate that he had approved and signed the following bill and resolution:

An act (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct in the District of Columbia.

A joint resolution (S. No. 24) authorizing Lieutenant Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to introduce, for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill, of which previous notice has been given, to establish a national foundry for the fabrication of cannon for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the bill be read. I want to know at what point the foundry is to be established.

Mr. LEITER. I object without its being read.

ABSENTEE ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House how many officers of the Army are now absent from their posts of duty, and are at the seat of the Federal Government; and how many, if any, are claiming to hold civil offices, by election or otherwise.

Mr. GARTRELL objected.

THE KANE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. HICKMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay to the officers and men of the expedition of Dr. Eliza Kent Kane to the Arctic seas, in search of Sir John Franklin, the same rate of pay that was allowed to the officers and seamen of the expedition under Lieutenant De Haven.

Mr. GARNETT objected.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 306, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, was rejected.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRANCH. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Debate is in order.

Mr. BRANCH. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks before this bill shall be put upon its passage. I shall detain the House but for a few minutes, if I am allowed to proceed without interruption; and before yielding the floor—as I propose to call the previous question—I shall give an opportunity to gentlemen who may desire to ask me questions. But, in the mean time, I beg gentlemen not to interrupt me; but let me proceed in my own way, and according to my own order. In this way time will be saved, and I will be able to present my views more satisfactorily to the House.

Mr. Speaker, in the remarks that I shall make in relation to this bill, I desire it to be understood that the Administration now in power, and through our friendship to which we have been appealed to to pass this bill, is the Administration of my choice. Not only its head, but the Cabinet by which that head is surrounded, met, at the time of their appointment, my approbation, and I have seen nothing since to diminish the confidence which I have, either in the head or in the members of the Cabinet. But while I say that, I desire it to be understood distinctly that I stand on this floor, not to carry out, without question or consideration, the recommendation of any Department of the Government; nor to receive the edicts that may be sent down to us by others as law which we dare not question or inquire into except on pain of being considered as wanting confidence in the Administration.

I am as much a friend of the Administration as any gentleman on this floor; but here is a measure pending which it is the duty of the representatives of the people to look into and consider carefully before they adopt it. And, sir, in the remarks which I shall make, if I find fault with practices which I imagine prevail in the Government, and which ought not to prevail, I do not wish to be understood as censuring this Administration; for I know that in many instances they are practices which have come down from Administrations which have preceded the one now in power.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said, in the course of the debate upon this bill, against deficiency bills. I believe that no gentleman has, as yet, announced the opinion which I entertain, and now fearlessly express—that so far from deficiency bills, of a proper character, and under proper guards, being open to censure, they are, on the contrary, one of the most powerful means in the hands of Congress to insure economy of expenditure in the Executive Departments. I do not object to deficiency bills when deficiency bills are proper; that is, when, in the judgment of Congress, there has not been an extravagance of expenditure on the part of the Executive Departments, nor a disregard of the requirements of law.

Suppose you allow it to be understood in the Executive Departments that the estimates made at the commencement of a fiscal year—or rather, as is the practice, a year in advance of the time when the money is to be expended—are to be final and conclusive on the Departments: is it not obvious that the Executive Departments, under that pressure, will take care to estimate largely enough to provide against all chance of the expenditures exceeding the amount appropriated? The estimates submitted under such an understanding will be larger even than the Executive Departments themselves might think necessary for the public service. On the other hand, if you allow it to be understood that if they will curtail their estimates, submit them at the lowest possible point, and honestly attempt to carry on the Government under those estimates, then, if they should need more money, Congress will vote it to them, there will be a better opportunity of securing economical estimates from the Treasury Department. Hence I do not object, in the terms used by gentlemen in this debate, against deficiency bills. Whenever a bill is presented that appears proper, and when it appears also that the Executive Departments have made honest efforts to keep within the appropriations made by Congress, and have been unable to do so, I am willing to grant it. I am not willing to see Congress establish a precedent that the Departments must stand by their original estimates; and that under no circumstances shall they have an additional appropriation; because, if you do, the effect will be inevitable that the executive officers will make extravagant estimates, in order that they may not be crippled.

So much for deficiency bills in general. Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this deficiency bill which is pending. It consists of several items for the different branches of the public service, differing not only in the magnitude of the amounts, but in the pressure of the necessity which calls for them. Much the largest part of this bill appropriates money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the Army. I admit that the expenditures on account of the Army have reached such a point that I have no hesitation in saying, on my responsibility as a Representative of the people, that they are monstrous, and entirely unjustified. I cast no censure on any particular Administration, or any particular bureau of the Government; for I have not the requisite information to state certainly where censure belongs. I do say, however, without hesitation, that, in my judgment, the expenditures for the Army of the United States have almost reached a point at which the country will rise up and demand retrenchment and reform in that particular at least. The Executive Departments are not censurable for all the items in this bill which look so large. Many of them are under the control of Congress. Some arise out of the former action of Congress. Let us look at the expenditures. A large part grows out of the necessity of sending an army to Utah. That necessity was not foreseen when the Executive Departments made their estimates of appropriations for the current year. A former Congress, in view of the circumstances which might render it necessary on the part of that Department to exceed the appropriation, expressly authorized the Secretary of War to make contracts and provide for the wants of the Army in anticipation of appropriations. So far, then, as these appropriations under the head of deficiencies for the Army are concerned, they are for money expended in pursuance of the law of 1820.

Much, sir, has been said by gentlemen on the other side in regard to the sending of an army to Utah; and the Committee on Territories have been interrogated repeatedly to know why they have not reported under a resolution referred to them, to inquire into the state of affairs in Utah. I cannot say whether rebellion exists in Utah or not; but I know that this House, at an early day, passed a resolution expressly declaring that the Territory of Utah was in a state of rebellion against the United States Government. Whatever may have been my opinion at that time, I believe now that that resolution expresses the truth. That resolution, too, was voted for by a number of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Now, I ask, if they thus declared, not only to the country, but to the President, that Utah is in a state of rebellion, and if they declared the truth, what excuse could the President make for a failure to use the means placed within his power to reduce the rebels of Utah to subjection? But in addition to that, the Constitution and laws of the United States invested the Executive with power to declare where the troops should be stationed.

In the exercise of that discretion he has determined to establish posts in the Territory of Utah. Is it proper for this House, even if it had not declared, at a former day, that Utah was in a state of rebellion, to undertake to control the discretion of the President as regards the position in which the troops shall be placed?

Mr. CLEMENS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRANCH. I made an express request at the outset that no gentleman would interrupt me. If the gentleman will wait until I am through, I will give him an opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, do gentlemen intend—do they think it comports with their duties as legislators and statesmen, when they themselves have declared that a Territory of this Union is in a state of rebellion—to turn round and refuse to furnish the President the means of suppressing that rebellion?

But aside from the war in Utah, there are other causes of a very large expenditure for our Army, to which I will briefly call the attention of the House, and those causes are dependent on the action of Congress. In my opinion, this monstrous expenditure of the Army results mainly from a practice that has grown up of late years, and which ought to be corrected by the Executive, and if the Executive fails to correct it, it ought to be corrected by Congress. That practice is the allowing half a dozen adventurous persons to go far beyond the frontiers of the settlements, and squat themselves down on the public lands, and then demand of the War Department a company of troops for their protection.

In the early history of the country, when the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, were being settled, they were occupied by savages far more ferocious than any now upon our frontiers. When our fathers went to that country, they went there with the hoe and spade in one hand and a rifle in the other, and they protected themselves against their savage foes. It is true the country is more able to afford protection now than it was then; but I ask if it is reasonable, just, and proper, that half a dozen adventurous persons should be allowed to go and settle in the wilderness, where there is no market for the grain they can raise, and then, to make a market, apply to the Government to send them a company of troops—the most substantial advantage of which is, that it furnishes them a purchaser for their produce?

If you will look at these reports from the War Department, you will find that the greater part of the extravagant expenditures of the Army are connected with the quartermaster's department, in consequence of the expense of transportation and supplies for troops far beyond the frontiers of civilization. I submit, therefore, that the first step towards retrenching these enormous expenditures should be the establishment of a cordon of posts, north and south, along the frontiers, from which, as occasion requires, the troops can be sent out into the Indian country to keep them in awe. That will have the effect of saving the enormous expenditure for transportation. It was not until this late practice of sending troops everywhere, when calls were made, far beyond the frontiers, that these enormous expenditures in the quartermaster's department were incurred.

It is said in the newspapers—I do not believe it, however—that these Indian wars are sometimes gotten up by the settlers for the purpose of furnishing a market and giving them an opportunity of making a speculation out of it. I do not attach much credit to such reports; but certain it is that the practice to which I have referred is likely to lead to many irregularities.

There is another cause of these large expenditures to which I now desire to call the attention of the House. We have recently had before us a bill to increase the Army of the United States. Well, sir, in my simplicity, I imagined that it would be a sufficient increase, and the most economical increase, to add to the number of privates in each company. I supposed we had officers enough, and that the proper mode of increasing the Army would be to increase the number of privates. Having always heard that our peace establishment was only a "skeleton" Army, to be filled up in time of war, I thought the time had arrived for filling up the skeleton, without enlarging it. A few of the friends around me, as inexperienced in military affairs as I was, were under the same impression; but we were told that an officer could not command more men than were placed under him under our present system. I had not definite information within my possession in respect to the organization of the armies of other nations in this respect. I have, however, since obtained information, from which I have made out a table, showing the number of privates commanded by a single officer, which I will read to the House.

Service.	Captains.	Lieutenants.	Total officers.	Privates and subalterns.	Men to each officer.
French infantry.....	1	2	3	110	37
French rifles.....	1	2	3	115 to 145	38 to 48
Austrian infantry—
Grenadiers.....	1	3	4	164	41
Other foot.....	1	3	4	195 to 215	65 to 73
Rifle company.....	-	-	-	174	44
Prussian infantry.....	1	4	5	219	44
Sardinian infantry.....	1	2	3	126	42
Sardinian rifles.....	1	2	3	133	44
Russian infantry.....	-	-	4	236	59
United States infantry in peace.....	1	2	3	42	14
United States infantry in war.....	1	2	3	74	25

This table includes all the European nations, with one exception, which have ever earned any military reputation. It appears that the average number of men commanded by one officer, in the European service, is forty-seven. In our infantry service, in time of peace, we have one officer for fourteen men, with authority given to the President to increase the number of privates in each regiment serving on the frontiers, so as to make, in our war establishment, one officer for every twenty-five men.

It is obvious that we have got an Army of officers almost exclusively; hence, in some measure, the great expense attending our Army. We have got officers enough; and the true way of increasing the Army would have been by adding to the number of privates in each company.

I remarked that there was an exception, and I referred to the army of Great Britain. I have not been able to obtain information in reference to that, but I imagine our system is copied from England. In England they may have no more men to an officer than we have here. But why? Simply because in England the only way of providing for the younger sons of the nobility and aristocracy, is to give them commissions in the army; and hence there is always a pressure of influence to increase the number of officers. And we, in this republican democracy, from a different motive, are following in the footsteps of aristocratic England, in order to give to public men and to public officers an opportunity of providing for their friends.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. BRANCH. Not now, sir; the gentleman can make a note, and I will give him an opportunity hereafter. There is another reason for these large expenditures to which I desire to call attention. No gentleman who has served in Congress, or has been much about Washington city, can have failed to discover that this Government has degenerated into a Government of bureaus and clerks. I have noticed that irresponsible bureau officers are allowed to make estimates to Congress, and Congress is called upon by the Administration to provide for those estimates. On that point I wish to read some very sensible remarks of the present very able Secretary of War, in his last annual report. In speaking of some of the errors in our service, he says:

"One of the greatest errors of detail is the separate, independent character of our staff corps. This removes them from their proper positions as aids or assistants to the commander, and constitutes them his equals. It contracts the sphere of observation and experience, and thus unfits the officer for change or advancement, and begets an accumulation of precedent and prerogative at war with the vital principle of military organization—the inviolable and undivided authority of the head. He is bound, as they are, by the law, and his construction of it should govern them, not theirs him."

Now, sir, that is a very sensible remark; and the only matter of surprise is, that that very Secretary, about the very same time that he wrote that able document, should have allowed the Quartermaster General to send estimates to this Congress for three, four, or five million dollars without his sanction; for such is the fact. Gentlemen, by looking at the miscellaneous documents, will find that there are estimates provided for in this bill for three or four million dollars, for which we have not the recommendation of any other officer than the Quartermaster General of the Army. We have not the means of holding responsible any officer of the Government, for the Quartermaster General is responsible to his military commander, and not to Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I remarked before, some of the causes of this enormous increase in the expenditures of the War Department are remediable by Congress. Some are abuses that have grown up from year to year, until it is difficult to remove them. I have confidence, however, that the present Administration will remove them, so far as it is practicable to do so. I feel satisfied that they will exert themselves, and that they have already commenced to exert themselves, to bring about reform; and that this is not an Administration that is going to take advantage of all the bad precedents that have been set, and will set no good ones for its successors. I know the material of which it is composed; and, from my knowledge of that material, I feel an entire conviction that many of these abuses will be reformed, so far as is dependent upon the executive department of the Government. But, in addition to that, Congress has got to reform some abuses also; and the first thing that we ought to do, would be, if possible, under the rules of the House, to call back the bill that was passed the other day providing for the raising of additional regiments, and substitute for it a bill that shall add to the number of privates in our Army, without increasing the number of officers.

But, sir, this is not the proper occasion to apply a remedy. You have an army in Utah; sent there, not in violation of law, but sent there in obedience to an obligation on the President to enforce the law of the land. You do not deny that the President had power to send the army there. You only question the wisdom of the discretion that he exercised in sending it. Now, sir, is Congress, because there are abuses which have been existing for several years, to avail itself of this critical moment, when you have three thousand of your brave troops in the mountains of Utah, with an enemy in front, and the howling wilderness behind them, to undertake to apply the extreme remedy which belongs to Congress of refusing supplies? I do not believe that this House will say that this is a suitable time to exercise that high prerogative that belongs to the Representatives of the people, of refusing supplies to carry on the Government. I believe that an overwhelming majority of the House are willing to pass a bill to appropriate the means that are necessary to supply the army in Utah.

But we find ourselves here crippled and hampered, because connected in the bill are a number of small objects altogether incongruous, and that have no necessary connection with each other. One gentleman objects that there is a provision in it for paying to clerks certain extra compensation, and thinks that so great an outrage that he will vote against the whole bill on account of it. I want to call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side of the House to the fact that this third section, which has done so much to destroy the bill, was put in there in consequence of the legislation of the last House, in which the Republicans had a large majority, and of which my friend from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who addressed the House yesterday upon this subject, was the acknowledged leader.

Mr. SEWARD. I only want to say to the gentleman that he is mistaken, and that that is the strongest part of the bill.

Mr. BRANCH. Other gentlemen object because there is in the bill a provision for paying to the reporters some $800 each.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to say that the Republican party had not a majority in the last Congress, and that I was not the recognized head of that party.

Mr. BRANCH. I will give the gentleman an opportunity after I get through. Others object because there is an item in it to pay for the surveys of public land in California. Gentlemen may be right in their opposition to these various matters. I am not prepared to say that they are not right. I myself am opposed to some of the provisions of the bill. I see no reason why, here in the middle of the session, gentlemen should have forced down their throats what they do not like, in order to get what they do like. I cast no censure on the Committee of Ways and Means. They have done their duty, not only in regard to this bill, but in regard to all the bills of this session, in an able and unexceptionable manner. But that is no reason why we should be compelled, here in the middle of the session, to vote for what we do not like, in order to get what we do like. We will have enough of that to do in the last night of the session, and we had better keep our stomachs in the best possible condition for that time.

My proposition is that, instead of forcing gentlemen to vote for what they do not like, in order to get what they do like, the Committee of Ways and Means should report separate bills for the support of the Army and for these other items. The others may command the approval of a majority of the House; and, if so, they will pass. But let us not cripple our Army, and the operations of our Government, on account of a gratuity to the reporters, however worthy of it they are, and of extra compensation to our clerks. It does not become the dignity of Congress to insist upon subjects so incongruous, in order to make one drive the other through.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say what I shall do in case of the failure of my proposition. I feel the pressure upon me to provide for our gallant army in Utah. I feel that my duty, as a member of Congress, is to do what I can to provide for it; because, if the President has sent them there wrongfully, it is not the fault of the army, it is the fault of the President. I would not have your army starved. I would not subject them to defeat and disaster; and subject our flag to be dragged in the mud and trampled upon by the rebellious citizens of the country, simply because the President has done wrong, if he has so done. If the President has done wrong, hold him to his responsibility before the country; or, if there be a strong enough case, in your judgment, hold him to responsibility to this House and the Senate by impeachment. But do not, while you have your remedy against the President, starve your little army, in order to strike an indirect blow against the President, which will not reach him.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question.

Mr. BRANCH. I incline to yield. I believe that under the rules of the House, I have a right to consume an hour; and before I close I intend to give time to gentlemen for questions.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman has but twenty minutes to speak; and I would like to know what time he is to allow for questions.

Mr. BRANCH. Well; as gentlemen all round me say that they want to ask questions, I will bring my remarks to a conclusion now by offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 306 be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in lieu of it a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the support of the Army.

2. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the payment of officers and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the House of Representatives.

3. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for miscellaneous items.

4. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent fund of the House.

5. A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department.

6. A bill making appropriations to pay extra compensation to clerks and other employees of the House, under resolutions of the last Congress; or to indemnify the late Clerk, if he has paid compensation. And that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. I object to the latter clause of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken, and that the House cannot, by a majority vote in the form proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, authorize any committee to report on any subject at any time.

Mr. BRANCH. Then strike out the latter clause.

The resolution was so modified.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from North Carolina stated that the estimates of the quartermaster's department were communicated immediately to the Committee of Ways and Means without the approval of the Secretary of War. Am I right?

Mr. BRANCH. What I said was, that the estimates came to us without any recommendation from the Secretary of War.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to correct that erroneous impression on gentlemen's minds—one which might very naturally arise. While this matter was pending, I had several interviews myself with the Secretary of War, and we passed over these items, one by one, with the desire to reduce the estimates to the lowest practicable point. After conferring with the Secretary of War, and making some reductions and alterations, he took back the estimates to have a conference with the Quartermaster General. The result of that conference was an agreement between them that he should send them to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the indorsement of the Secretary of War upon them. I asked unanimous consent of the House to report them, in order that they might be printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Unanimous consent was granted; and they were ordered to be printed and referred. If the gentleman will examine the Journal he will find that that is so.

Mr. BRANCH. I am very glad to hear from the Committee of Ways and Means that such is the fact, and I express the opinion here that any head of Department of this Government ought not to hesitate to dismiss promptly from office any bureau officer or clerk of the Government who would presume to communicate to Congress otherwise than through the head of the Department.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The House ordered these estimates to be printed, but the Printer omitted to print the indorsement of the Secretary of War upon them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to see where that indorsement is. In Miscellaneous Document No. 22, containing all these estimates, there is no indorsement or recognition of this document from the Secretary of War.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will look to the end of the document, he will find that it is addressed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will look on the last page of this document—

Mr. BRANCH. I cannot yield further. I am satisfied with the explanation of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; and I am glad to find that so gross an official outrage has not been perpetrated by any subordinate officer of the Department.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from North Carolina will allow me one word. On the last page of this Miscellaneous Document No. 22 is a letter which purports to have been written by the Quartermaster General, and addressed to the Secretary of War, dated January 6, 1858. The estimates themselves are dated on the 12th of January. There is nothing going to show that the Secretary of War ever sanctioned these estimates; or if there is, I have not been able to perceive it.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to have an opportunity of replying to some of the remarks which have been submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, because it strikes me that they ought not to be allowed to go to the country without a reply. I understood the gentleman—for I could not hear him distinctly from my seat—to refer to the extraordinary expenses of the Army. I desire to inquire of him what that expense is?

Mr. BRANCH. I will call the previous question on my resolution, and then pursue the same course I pursued yesterday with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia if he will renew the call for the previous question; but I do not feel authorized to open this bill to general debate again.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to these arrangements.

Mr. BRANCH. If objections be made, I will then insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question, provided that the debate can be confined to this side of the House. I understand that the other side of the House are opposed to the bill anyhow, and therefore there is no need for them to discuss it.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order upon the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRANCH.] My point of order is this: that the resolution proposes to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report six bills in lieu of this bill. Now, the House itself could not amend the bill so as to cut it up into six bills; and I submit that the House cannot instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to do what it cannot itself do.

Mr. BRANCH. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and modify my resolution so as to simply refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, without instructions. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. If that is the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, and the House agree to it, I hope the Committee of Ways and Means will consider the instructions offered in the resolution as originally proposed, and will carry out the sense of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to inquire what would be the effect of sustaining the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It will be to bring the House to a vote, first, upon the motion to recommit, and if that fails, then upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the House will sustain the demand for the previous question, and leave the responsibility of defeating this bill with the other side of the House, where it properly belongs.

The previous question was seconded, (one hundred and eight members having voted therefor,) and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WARREN. Would it be in order to move to lay the motion to recommit on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. STANTON. If this engrossed bill is re-committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, will they have the power to amend it, or change it?

The SPEAKER. That is a point the Chair has been trying to ascertain. The 120th rule of the House provides that after the engrossment and third reading of a bill before its passage, it may be recommitted. Now, if the committee have no power to amend, it would be a useless ceremony to send the bill there, yet this is one of the oldest rules of the House. But as the question does not properly arise now, the Chair will reserve any final decision upon the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to recommit. The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 127; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Bonham, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Burnett, Case, Horace F. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Coffax, Conins, Cragin, Burton Craige, Curry, Darnell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, English, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Grow, Robert B. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, William Smith, Stallworth, William Stewart, Tabbot, Miles Taylor, Trippe, Underwood, Waldron, Walton, Israel Washburn, Winslow, and Augustus R. Wright—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bliss, Boeck, Boyce, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Canine, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Hall, Harlan, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Washburne, White, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollieffer—127.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

Pending the above call,

Mr. RITCHIE stated that his colleague, Mr. Dick, was sick, and detained at home in consequence, and that he had paired off with Mr. WHITELEY, of Delaware.

Mr. HUYLER stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. ADRAIN.

Mr. REILLY stated that he had paired off with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was in favor of recommitting the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means that the features in it to which I object might be stricken out, but having failed in that, I feel constrained now, under all the circumstances, to vote for the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it in order to explain my vote before the roll is called?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the operation of the previous question.

Mr. CLAY. I will explain why I shall vote for the bill.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAY. There are some of the features of this bill which are exceedingly objectionable to me, and which, I think, ought to be stricken out. However, rather than place myself in a position of retarding the operations of the Government, or embarrassing them in the least, I shall vote for the bill, at the same time protesting against the objectionable features of it, which are there against my vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to debate.

Mr. MASON. I should like to state why I shall not change my vote.

Mr. CLEMENS. And so should I.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burns, Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Horace P. Clark, John B. So the bill was passed.

Mr. LETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. There has been one motion to reconsider, and the gentleman's motion is not in order.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

The SPEAKER. Reports are now in order from the Committee of Claims, of matters reported from the Court of Claims.

Mr. BISHOP. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 75; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee said: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the latter clause of the 39th rule be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No member or other person shall visit or remain by the Clerk's table while the yeas and nays are calling, or ballots are counting."

ORDER OF BUSINESS, ETC.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COBB. If the House determine to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will not the District police bill be the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. COBB. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts takes precedence.

On motion of Mr. MAYNARD, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of an act (S. No. 107) for the relief of Ephraim Hunt; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask leave to make a report from the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts takes precedence.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is not the regular order of business the call of committees for reports of a private nature?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Then I hope we will have that call before going into committee.

Mr. GOODE. I deem it my duty to say that, if the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House be voted down, I shall move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where the police bill is the first business in order.

The SPEAKER. That motion has been made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his motion.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to permit me to make a report from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I must decline to yield.

Mr. GOODE demanded tellers on Mr. CHAFFEE's motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KEITT and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 71.

Mr. GOODE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROUGHS moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered on Mr. CHAFFEE's motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I am satisfied that nothing will be done to-day, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I think it proper that the House should now adjourn, to take notice of a fact in the history of the country. A distinguished ex-member of the Senate of the United States, and one who has long enjoyed the confidence of the country, has, within the last few moments, departed this life. I hope the motion to adjourn will prevail.

Several MEMBERS. Who is it?

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. The Hon. Thomas H. Benton.

The motion of Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, was agreed to; and the House thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past two o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until Monday.

After the Speaker had announced the House adjourned—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, who had sought the floor before the motion to adjourn was put, said: Colonel Benton handed me a letter this morning, with a request that if he should die any time soon, and any notice should be taken of his death in the House, I would have it read. I now ask that it be read. The Clerk read the letter as follows:

C STREET, WASHINGTON, April 8, 1858.

To you, as old Tennessee friends, I address myself, to say that in the event of my death here, I desire that there shall not be any notice of it in Congress. There is no rule of either House that will authorize the announcement of my death; and if there were such a rule, I should not wish it to be applied in my case, as being contrary to my feelings and convictions, long entertained, as shown in a note to a speech of Mr. Randolph on the occasion of the death of Mr. David Walker, published in the Abridgement of Debates, volume six, page 566. The request of Mr. Walker, there recorded, and the remarks of Mr. Randolph, express entirely my sentiments and convictions. Should, therefore, any of my kind friends, in either House, make it necessary to do so, I intrust to you to make known, by means of this note, my express wish and desire that the event remain unnoticed in Congress.

Your old Tennessee friend,
THOMAS H. BENTON.

To SAMUEL HOUSTON, Esq.,
Senator in Congress from the State of Texas, and GEORGE W. JONES, Esq.,
Representative in Congress from Tennessee.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 12, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. B. F. BITTINGER.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. F. CARTER, its chief clerk, announced that it had passed a bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858; which, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had adhered to its amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to remark that at one o'clock to-morrow, if not before, I shall call up the bill just received from the House of Representatives; and I give notice that I shall ask for prompt action on the subject.

DEATH OF COLONEL BENTON.

Mr. POLK. I do not think it would be in consonance with the wishes of Colonel Benton, as expressed just before his death, in a letter addressed by him to General Houston of the Senate, and Mr. G. W. Jones of the House of Representatives, that any public demonstration should be made in consequence of his death; but in order to give to each individual member of the Senate, as a citizen, an opportunity of attending his funeral which takes place from his house at two o'clock to-day, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest to the honorable Senator that he modify his motion so as to make it that the Senate will adjourn at one o'clock. That will enable us to go through the morning business. Let the motion be modified so that when the hour of one o'clock arrives, the President shall adjourn the Senate.

Mr. POLK. If it meets the view of the Senate I have no objection at all to that proposition. On the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire I withdraw my former motion, and now move that at one o'clock the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented an additional paper in support of the claim of A. G. Allen, late Navy agent at Washington city; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. IVERSON presented a letter of Montgomery Blair, late solicitor of the Court of Claims, recommending an amendment of the act establishing the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMMOND presented a memorial of officers of insurance companies and others, citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, remonstrating against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COLLAMER presented the petition of William Wheelwright, praying that measures may be taken for the establishment of a direct communication with the South American States by mail steamers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of John Ewen, president of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, praying for certain amendments to the act of 1793, for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisherics, and for registering the same; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. HALE. I have in my hand a petition to which I wish to get the attention of the Senate. It is from a class of men who do not often trouble the Senate, and a class of men who are entitled to our consideration if any class is. The petition is signed by some twenty or thirty—I have not counted the number—of the inmates of the Military Asylum of this District. They pray that such compensation may be provided for them as the Government may deem just, as an equivalent for their future subsistence, in preference to the alternative of becoming residents of the Military Asylum. If the Senate will indulge me for three minutes, I wish to make a short statement of facts.

Since the attention of the Senate has been called to this subject, I can say with perfect truth that not a day has gone over my head, not even Sunday, that some old cripple on his crutches, or some lame or infirm old soldier, has not been to me, as I had moved in this matter, with complaints of the manner in which they are treated in this institution. They say that their money is not only perverted, but they are literally imprisoned, for they have not the privilege of going off the grounds without a written pass. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the condition and state of affairs there, and report to this House. I think, sir, if there is a single subject on which the Senate are bound to act, it is their duty, by every consideration that can address itself to them, to see that these old veterans who have defended your frontier, and carried the flag of your country in triumph to the capital of a neighboring nation, shall not be wandering about this city making complaints of the manner in which their contributions for their own support are perverted and wasted by this Government. I hope the petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the instructions I have proposed.

Mr. WILSON. I hope, Mr. President, that the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his motion, and consent that a motion shall be made to refer this matter to a special committee. I do not think the Committee on Military Affairs can have the time this session to make the investigation that is demanded. I have no doubt that the grossest abuses exist, and I hope that this petition will be referred to a special committee; and that it will take time and make a thorough investigation, and that the facts will come before the Senate and the country in an authentic form. If abuses exist, let those abuses be corrected. If unnecessary complaints are made, let it be understood that there is no foundation for those complaints. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his motion, and move that a special committee be appointed—a committee that can attend to this investigation; for I assure him that the Committee on Military Affairs cannot devote that attention to the subject which it demands.

Mr. MASON. If there are abuses existing at this institution, they should of course be inquired into, exposed, and remedied; but I know very well, as doubtless the honorable Senator who presented the petition does, that there are very few, especially at the advanced age that persons are admitted into this asylum, who, from nature and finding themselves under necessary restraints—restraints necessary for their own well-being and for their comfort—are not prone to complain, and to complain extravagantly, and with a great deal of color. I know nothing of this institution in the world, except that it has been established by the Government for most benevolent and philanthropic purposes. I do happen to know one of its officers, who has the charge, to some extent, of the asylum. Of his actual administration of it I know nothing; but of his character I know that which entitles me to say that it is impossible that actual abuses can exist under the administration of such a man. I do not mean, however, as honorable Senators think it is a subject fit for investigation, to prevent an investigation; but I submit that, as it belongs to the military establishment, the proper tribunal to make the investigation is the Military Committee. They will have time, beyond all question, to make any examination that will be necessary to inquire into the facts. But with every disposition to treat with proper respect the complaints of the tenants at the asylum, I know enough of human nature to know that the chances are very large that their complaints are utterly unfounded; still, they should be inquired into. If the honorable Senator, therefore, will withdraw the motion he has made to refer it to the Military Committee, I shall renew it; and being the preferable motion, of course it will be first put.

Mr. HALE. I know nothing about these matters. I introduced a resolution of inquiry at the last Congress, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Military Committee made a report, which did disclose abuses. Upon that report a vote was had by this body, and concurred in by the House of Representatives, abolishing the asylum at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, and ordering it to be sold. Since that, I have not been to the hospital; I have not seen, or inquired, or busied myself about it; but inasmuch as I introduced the resolution, I do not state extravagantly when I say, that a day does not pass over my head, not even Sunday, when some one or more of these old men do not come up hobbling to my room, (and I room in a third or fourth story, I do not know how high,) making these complaints. I have simply discharged my duty by presenting their petition, and making the appropriate motion. It is with the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The institution of which the Senator speaks is, I believe, under the charge of the War Department. I am very certain that it is under the charge of officers of the Army. I have seen specific and very grave charges made in regard to the mismanagement of the institution. If those charges are true, they are outrageous. There can be no question of that, if they are true. How much of truth there may be in them, I do not know. I know this: that it is natural to all men in a dependent condition constantly to make complaints. I think it possible that a great deal of the complaint in this instance is unjust; but I also think it possible that there may be a good deal of just complaint. I believe that, when the Government has attempted to establish a charity like this—for it is little else than that—and has gone to the expense that it has, some sincere effort should be made to carry it out in the spirit in which it was framed. If there is any justice whatever in the complaints that have been made, the institution is woefully mismanaged.

I believe that the course suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is the correct one. I do not believe the Committee on Military Affairs can go into this investigation and give to it that attention which it should have. It may be that it will require but a very short investigation. It may, however, be one of some considerable length. I trust the matter will be referred to a select committee. By mere accident I am at this time thrown at the head of the Military Committee; and I know that there is more labor, more trouble thrown on my own hands, than I feel myself able to stand up to. In my opinion, the nature and character of those charges call at our hands for an investigation of some sort; and that can best be had by means of a special committee. If those in charge of the institution are not fulfilling their duties and acting in a spirit of more justice and liberality than from the specific charges that I have seen would appear, they ought to be taken away and others placed in their positions. Who is at the head of the institution I do not know, and therefore I can speak with no personal feeling whatever. I hope the Senator will make his motion for a special committee, and let it be investigated. I cannot believe a special committee will be obtained in this body to report on this matter, that would willfully do injustice to officers of the Army, or others who may be in charge of the institution.

Mr. IVERSON. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators in the opinion that if one half, or one third, or a much smaller proportion, of the complaints urged against the officers of the institution be true, it is due to the interests and the character of the country that a severe investigation should be had. I do not know whether any of them be true or not; but I will take this occasion to say that one of the officers implicated, Dr. King, called on me a few days ago, and said to me that he invited an investigation; and if the Senate did not institute one of its own accord, he would present a memorial to the Senate, asking that a committee be appointed for the purpose of investigating, fully and critically, his conduct, at least. He not only invites, but demands, an investigation; and he is one of the officers whose conduct has been implicated in the management of this institution, by the charges which have been made. I know nothing about these charges; but I think that where there is so much smoke there must be some fire. That is my impression. I fear that this institution has not been managed in the manner that was intended by the charitable disposition of Congress when it was organized; and I doubt very much whether it can or ever will be so managed, under the charge of officers of the Army; and it is generally placed under old officers, who have grown gray in the service, and who, from a long course of command, have become probably too harsh in their management of the common soldier. It is very difficult for them to treat the soldier with that degree of leniency and charity and forbearance which the old worn out veteran probably demands at their hands. The probability is, I think, from all I have heard, that there is too much harsh treatment manifested at the institution from the hands of the officers of it towards the inmates, and that abuse, if it exists, demands correction.

I doubt very much, too, whether the finances of the institution have been managed according to the plan that Congress originally intended. At any rate, there are complaints, there are charges, urged against the management of the funds of the institution, which I think demand investigation.

Another thing: this institution is under the control and management of a board of trustees—some seven or eight or more Army officers. It is an unwieldy concern. The responsibility is so much divided that they pay little or no attention to it. I think it very doubtful whether it be not necessary to change the whole management of the institution, and take it from under a board of officers and put it under the control of the Secretary of War, or some other responsible person, who will attend to it and manage it properly.

I am in favor of the investigation sought by the Senator from New Hampshire, but I object positively and unequivocally to the investigation being imposed upon the Committee on Military Affairs. Look, sir, at the condition of that committee. The chairman, we all know, is in such a situation that he will be utterly unable, probably, to attend to any of the active duties of a Senator, or a member of the committee, during the present session. From the situation in which I understand he is, I think it extremely doubtful whether he will be able to attend to any of the duties of the committee during the rest of the session. Another member of the committee, yourself, sir, is in the chair, and the duties which you are called upon to perform in the chair render it wholly impracticable for you to attend to anything else. You could not go to the Asylum to make an investigation. I think it will be necessary for a committee, if they investigate the subject thoroughly, to visit the Asylum, to look into all its details. To investigate all the facts will require a great deal of personal labor. It will require the examination of many witnesses. It will require an investigation into the finances of the institution, an examination into the effects and bearing of the board of trustees appointed to manage this concern. There are various subjects connected with it which, I think, require investigation, and probably reform. It may be necessary to reform the institution entirely, its management and control. The Committee on Military Affairs, I am satisfied, will not have it in its power to give that attention to this subject which its importance demands. The business of that committee, from the condition of the chairman and other members of the committee, is very much behindhand. It has now a large mass of business before it, which I think it will be utterly unable to transact during the residue of the session. I know that so far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee, it will be impracticable for me to give any attention to this investigation. I am already chairman, as the Senate knows, of the Committee on Claims, the most laborious position, perhaps, that can be assigned to any Senator. We have now, perhaps, more than one hundred cases to investigate in that committee, besides those which have already undergone our scrutiny. It is a laborious service; and adding that to the ordinary duties of a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, it would be utterly impossible that I, for one, should be able to transact any business in relation to this institution. I think the Senator from Arkansas, who is the temporary chairman of the Military Committee, is in the same condition. I do not believe that committee will investigate, I do not believe it can investigate, the facts which are intended to be, and ought to be, investigated in regard to this matter.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES.....No. 98.

It is therefore nugatory—it is idle—it is worse than useless to refer this investigation to the Committee on Military Affairs. A special committee ought to be appointed who, if they have time, may, during the session of Congress, go out to the asylum and institute a strict scrutiny and investigation into this whole business. I doubt very much whether even any special committee will have it in its power during the session of Congress to give that attention to the subject which it demands, and which it ought to receive at our hands. I question very much whether any committee, either special or general, will not find it necessary to ask leave to sit during the recess of Congress for the purpose of making the necessary investigation. But a special committee, when they come to look into it, if they find they have not the time and cannot spare the necessary labor to investigate the whole proceeding during the session, can ask for additional time to sit during the recess, if the facts become so important as that the investigation should be continued beyond the session of Congress.

I trust, then, that the Senate will not refer this question to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will tell them, in advance, that if they do this, the investigation cannot be had. I am satisfied that committee cannot, without abandoning all their other business—and some of it is of a very important character—give that attention to this subject which it ought to receive at the hands of a committee and of this body. I therefore trust that the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his motion to refer this subject to the Committee on Military Affairs, and let it go to a special committee.

Mr. HALE. I will make that motion to refer the subject to a select committee, upon the suggestion of the Committee on Military Affairs. But, as the first question in order, then, will be on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, I put in this motion now to refer the subject to a select committee, so that the Senate can have the alternative before them when they vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I propose to amend the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, by adding to it, "that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. HALE. I accept that.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire, as modified by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, will be adopted by the Senate. The acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Senator from Georgia have stated to the Senate the condition of that committee. They cannot possibly devote attention to this subject. It has been talked about for some weeks by the members of that committee, and I think I may say here, that it is their unanimous opinion that an investigation ought to be had. These complaints come to us from men who have served their country for years with fidelity; they are entitled to be heard; an investigation ought to take place. It is due to these old soldiers; it is due also to the officers who have the care of the institution. The charges that have been made ought to be investigated; and if true, Congress ought to correct them; if they are untrue, the country ought to know it.

Without detaining the Senate any longer, I will repeat only what other Senators on the committee have said, that if it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, we cannot investigate the matter. If it be referred to a special committee, I think one can be raised in this body who can devote a few days to the consideration of this subject. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will sus-tain the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the rules, a proposition to refer to a standing committee is first in order. The question will therefore first be on the motion to refer the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs with the proposed instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on referring the petition to a select committee, with the instructions proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. IVERSON. I suggest as an amendment, that the select committee have power to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. HALE. I presume it will be necessary to fix the number of the select committee. I should think three would be enough. I move that the bill be referred to a select committee of three members, to be appointed by the President pro tempore, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

The motion was agreed to, and it was Ordered, That the petition of George Masson and others, inmates of the Military Asylum in the District of Columbia, be referred to a select committee to consist of three members to be appointed by the Chair, with instructions to inquire into the manner in which this institution has been conducted, and into the condition and treatment of its inmates; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Bancroft Woodcock, for an extension of his patent, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John A. Pitts and Hiram A. Pitts, for an extension of their patents, submitted an adverse report; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and in concurrence therewith it was Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners be rejected, and that they have leave to withdraw the transcripts of judicial proceedings accompanying their petition.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel James, Ignatius Lucas, Charles Tilley, and Thomas S. Burgey, messengers of the Navy Department, for increased compensation, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition; which was agreed to. He submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of F. M. Gunnell, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 253) for the relief of F. M. Gunnell, a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Ambrose Whitbeck, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to. He submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to. He submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN MOYLAN.

Mr. BIGLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the Court of Claims to return to the Senate the memorial and papers of the heirs of General Stephen Moylan, deceased.

NAVAL MACHINE-SHOP.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and instructed to cause a thorough examination of the iron, coal, and timber of the Deep River county, in the State of North Carolina, and that he report upon the expediency of establishing, at some point in that State, machine and work shops, for the construction of engines, boilers, &c., for naval vessels; and that he report the same to Congress at its next session.

Mr. HALE objecting to the consideration of the resolution, it lies over under the rules.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the Senate adjourned.

DEATH OF COLONEL BENTON.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. It is known to the country, Mr. Speaker, that Colonel Benton died the day before yesterday. His corpse is in this city, and his funeral will take place at two o'clock. In view of the request made by the deceased to Senator Houston, of Texas, and Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, I propose to take no further notice of his death in the House than to move that the House adjourn, so as to give members an opportunity to attend the funeral.

The motion was agreed to; and the House adjourned.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 258) concerning seamen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NAVAL MACHINE SHOP.

On motion by Mr. HALE, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MALLORY; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and instructed to cause a thorough examination of the iron, coal, and timber of the Deep River country, in the State of North Carolina, and that he report upon the expediency of establishing, at some point in that State, machine and work shops, for the construction of engines, boilers, &c., for naval vessels; and that he report the same to Congress at its next session.

LUTHER JEWETT.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire the Senate to take up a bill which has been recently reported. It was passed by the Senate at the last Congress, and has received the unanimous sanction of the Committee on Claims. I think there will be no sort of objection to it. It is the bill (S. No. 245) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Luther Jewett, late collector of the district of Portland and Falmouth, in the State of Maine. The reason is, that there is a case pending in the courts against him, and this bill was brought in at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to authorize this allowance to be made.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to credit the account of Luther Jewett, late collector of the district of Portland and Falmouth, with the amount of $1,000, that sum having been lost in transitu from him to be deposited with the assistant treasurer at Boston.

It appears that the late Luther Jewett, as collector of the customs for the district of Portland and Falmouth, being required by the Treasury Department to deposit the public money in his hands, from time to time, with the assistant treasurer of the United States at Boston, asked authority of the Department to employ Messrs. Langley & Co., expressmen, to carry the money. Langley & Co., whose business was exclusively that of expressmen, and who were employed by the banks and merchants generally to carry specie and money securities between Boston and Portland, were in good standing, and had the entire confidence of the public. It would seem, too, that, with the exception of going personally to Boston with the money, the employment of this express was as safe and prudent a course as Mr. Jewett could have adopted. In his application, Mr. Jewett stated that the charge of Langley & Co. would be "twenty-five cents for each thousand dollars;" and, in reply, the Department, acknowledging the receipt of his letter, gave no distinct permission to employ the express, but said: "I have received your letter of the 3d instant, in reply to mine of the 23d ultimo. I would state, in reply, that the act of March 3, 1849, requires that the collectors shall deposit their collections; the expenses attending such a deposit will be a proper charge upon the Treasury, and will be allowed in the settlement of your account as disbursing agent." Jewett made his deposits, regarding this letter as his authority, with the sub-Treasury at Boston, through Langley & Co.; and the expenses were charged in his accounts, and allowed by the Department. Langley & Co. suddenly failed in the fall of 1852, and Jewett now found that they had failed to deposit two sums of money severally placed in their hands—one of $1,000, and one of $1,500. This failure was total, and brought great distress upon the mercantile community; and the committee are assured, by a reliable statement, that Jewett himself lost a large sum of his own money by it. He produced Langley & Co.'s receipt for the $1,000, but none for the $1,500; nor does he make such proof as the Committee on Claims deem satisfactory that he sent this sum by the express. Under the circumstances, the committee report a bill for the relief of the memorialist to the extent of the $1,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FABIUS STANLEY.

Mr. BIGGS. As the Senate appears to be through with the morning business, I ask that they take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 208) for the relief of Fabius Stanley.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By the bill the proper accounting officers of the Treasury will be directed to pay to Fabius Stanley, as full compensation for his services during the time he was actually on duty and attached to the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, at the rate of $2,100 per annum, deducting therefrom the pay he received for his services during that period.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Clerk read the report made by Mr. MALLORY, on the 19th of March last, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Fabius Stanley, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of a lieutenant and that of a commander during the time he was actually attached to the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, have had the same under consideration, and report:

The petitioner, a lieutenant in the Navy, was detailed on the 22d of November, 1854, by the Navy Department, for duty at the navy-yard, Mare Island, California; and under this order he performed duty there for about one year, he being the only commissioned officer, besides Commander Farragut, commanding the yard. The petitioner's pay was $1,500 per annum. This, as he alleges, was insufficient to support him; and he cites the following as the rates of pay at the yard at the time, namely: Carpenters, blacksmiths, and masons, $8 per day; clerks, $8 20 per day; laborers, $5 50 to $6 50 per day.

Your committee find that, under the act of the 5th of August, 1854, the commander of this yard, entitled by his lineal rank to $2,100 per annum, received $3,500 per annum (the pay of the next highest grade) in consequence of the enhanced price of all the expenses of living in California; and upon referring to the Senators from that State for information as to such expenses at the time of Lieutenant Stanley's service, they state it to be about fifty per cent. above those in the eastern States: "servants' hire, board, washing, &c., being from fifty to one hundred per cent. higher."

The Secretary of the Navy, on the 18th of February, 1857, in response to a letter addressed to him by the committee on this case, says: "My opinion is, that the pay of the officers of the navy-yard at San Francisco has not been fairly proportioned to the immense extra expenses to which they have been subjected. I have frequently officially recommended that the pay of the officers at that navy-yard should be greater than that of those at other yards. In the case of Mr. Stanley I am not aware of any other peculiar claim."

The prayer of the petitioner is for commander's pay in lieu of that he received as lieutenant; and deeming his prayer reasonable, your committee report a bill accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. L. ALLEN AND A. R. CARTER.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up a little bill (S. No. 162) for the relief of John L. Allen, and Asa R. Carter. It has passed the Senate two or three times and been lost in the House of Representatives for want of time. I presume it will not lead to debate. If it should, I shall consent that it lie over.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to John L. Allen and Asa R. Carter, of the sum of $6,100, in full for their extra services, clerk hire, &c., in locating as register and receiver of the land office at Augusta, Mississippi, certain Choctaw scrip certificates, and lands for the Ohio and Mobile railroad, during the years 1850, 1851, 1852, and 1853.

During the three years and a half the petitioners held the offices of register and receiver, their compensation for cash entries of lands and lands entered with military warrants, amounted to $871 94, exclusive of their respective salaries, $500 each, and during these three and a half years, there were entered at the office twenty-two thousand one hundred and one and one seventh acres of land, located with Choctaw scrip, besides all the lands located for the Ohio and Mobile railroad, which required much extra labor, clerk hire, &c.; for all of which the petitioners have received no compensation. The Committee on Public Lands are of opinion that it is but fair and just the petitioners should be paid a liberal compensation for the extra labor and clerk hire necessarily performed and employed by them in locating the Choctaw scrip and railroad lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSULAR DECREES IN CHINA.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, upon the message of the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the decree and regulation made by the United States Commissioner to China, on the 4th of March, 1857. The resolution ought to be passed. It is simply a resolution of this body.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by the Judiciary Committee on the 20th of March:

Resolved, That no revision by Congress of the decree and regulation made by Peter Parker, Commissioner of the United States in China, on the 4th of March, A. D. 1857, entitled "Regulation for the consular courts of the United States of America in China," is requisite.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state very briefly the object of the resolution. Under an act of Congress, the Commissioner of the United States in China is authorized to make rules and regulations, and transmit them to the President, to be laid before Congress for revision. The Commissioner in China, on the 4th of March, 1857, owing to the disturbed state of affairs there, made a certain regulation or decree for holding the consular courts in the different ports on board of United States vessels, with the consent of the commander; and in the absence of a United States vessel, on board any ordinary commercial vessel of the United States, with the consent of the captain of the vessel. The object was only to enable them to have jurisdiction when, from the disturbed state of affairs, their functions could not be performed on land. The committee were unanimous in the opinion that the decree was a proper one; and therefore, in their opinion, required no revision. The resolution was adopted.

CONVEYANCES OF VESSELS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to take up a bill which I reported a few days since from the Committee on Commerce. I think it will give rise to no debate. It is a bill in relation to recording bills of sales of vessels.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 248) to amend or define the act of July 29, 1850, entitled "An act providing for recording the conveyances of vessels, and for other purposes," was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that when the bill of sale, mortgage, conveyance, or hypothecation, named in the first section of the act of July 29, 1850, shall have been made at the port where the vessel is permanently registered, or enrolled, it shall be taken as a compliance with the law; and it shall not be necessary to record the bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, at the port where such vessel may be temporarily registered, or enrolled.

Mr. HAMLIN. The object of the bill is simply to supersede the necessity of recording these papers under a temporary license, or enrollment; and it meets the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH HARDY AND ALTON LONG.

Mr. POLK. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 198) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long.

Mr. WILSON. I shall have to object to that. There is a special assignment for half past twelve o'clock, which I want to take up now, and I call for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that, under the rules, the day having passed over for which the bill to which he alludes was made the special order at half past twelve o'clock, it loses its precedence over the other special orders.

Mr. WILSON. I understood that a special assignment did not lose its place. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not object to taking up the matter now. I think we may dispose of it in a few moments. I allude to the bill to facilitate communication with the army in Utah. If anything is to be done at this session it ought to be done at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is in the power of Congress of course to take up the bill out of its order; but there are several special orders which take precedence of it. The day having passed for which that bill was made the special order at half past twelve o'clock, it goes at the foot of the special orders, and does not now obtain precedence.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Chair is mistaken. The rule says:

"Special orders shall not lose their position on account of intervening adjournments; nor shall they lose their relative position on the Calendar, except by vote of the Senate, until finally disposed of."

However, I will not insist on that. I move to take up the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri had the floor. I supposed the object of the Senator from Massachusetts in rising at first, was simply to put a question to the Senator from Missouri, which has caused the irregularity that has intervened. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POLK. I do not think the bill to which I called the attention of the Senate will occupy long. I hope it will be taken up. It is a bill (S. No. 198) reported from the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 198) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to instruct the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain, as in the case of John P. B. and Henry Gratiot, what amount, if any, of rent was exacted by the United States agents of lead mines from Joseph Hardy, for lead mined and smelted upon the lands of the Ottawa, Pottawatomie, Chippewa, Winnebago, or other tribes of Indians, prior to their purchase by the United States, and to pay such amount as may be legally proved to have been actually paid by Joseph Hardy to such agents of the United States, to Joseph Hardy and Alton Long.

Mr. POLK. I will state, for the information of the Senate, the nature of this claim. Prior to the purchase from the Indians, by the United States, of the country in the neighborhood of Galena, these claimants leased of the Indians the right to dig and take the lead on a certain tract of land. The United States sent an agent there, and compelled them, though the United States had not acquired title to the land, to pay, in the shape of a rent to the United States, a per centum of all the lead that they dug. They continued to pay rent after the United States purchased the land of the Indians. There was a claim of the same character, in favor of John P. B. and Henry Gratiot. J. P. B. Gratiot presented his claim to Congress, and Congress appropriated to him so much as the Government had extracted from him by virtue of this lease, which they claimed the right to give to him—the right to mine merely—because they had the power to do it. The land at that time still belonged to the Indians, and the right they had gotten from the Indians was merely a usufructuary right. This bill proposes that there shall be refunded to these claimants the amount of rent that was extracted from them by the United States under similar circumstances, just as the United States have already refunded to J. P. B. Gratiot. I will state that the interest they had was a usufructuary interest merely, and therein was not in conflict with the position the United States have always holden to the Indian lands, to wit: that they will allow no use by the Indians, except a usufructuary use of the land. This party had only that which was got from the Indians; but before the United States acquired title, they said to him that he should pay a rent to them for the usufructuary interest he had in the land, he having also come under obligations to, and purchased this right from, the Indians. It is merely to refund him the amount the United States took from him.

Mr. STUART. I inquire of the Senator if he knows what the amount is? It is not stated in the bill.

Mr. POLK. The official documents will show that.

Mr. STUART. About what amount is it?

Mr. POLK. I am not able to state. I do not now recollect. I did not draw the report. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Iverson] drew it.

Mr. IVERSON. It is not very large. There is a letter accompanying the bill showing it.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read the following letter:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 21, 1850.

SIR: Your letter of the 14th instant, addressed to the Secretary of War, desiring certain papers and information, having reference to the mining and smelting operations of Joseph Hardy, late of the Galena lead mines, and now a claimant before Congress, has been referred for the consideration of this office and for reply, the mineral business of the United States being under its management.

After a careful examination of all the documents, books, and papers on file in this office, having any connection or relation to mineral affairs, there is no contract, lease, license, or permit to be found among them in the name of said claimant; but I have the honor to furnish you with an exhibit of the amount of rent lead paid by Joseph Hardy to agents of the United States, prepared from their abstracts and returns made to the ordinance bureau, then having charge of the United States lead mines and all matters pertaining thereto, being full amount exacted as rent from the year 1826 up to the ratification of the treaty of Prairie du Chien, with the Indians, for the purchase of that section of country, the mines being within the boundary of that cession. I have included, also, in the sum total of rents paid the amount taken from entries in the account books of said agents or superintendents which should properly be added—that is, taking it for granted they are equally conclusive testimony with the returns, &c., in favor of Mr. Hardy.

The fact of such an amount of rent lead having been paid, and returns of the same made by the officers of the Government to the proper department, the implication I think is clear that a lease, permit, or other agreement between the United States and Mr. Hardy once existed.

The total amount of rent lead paid by Joseph Hardy, and within the period above stated, is one hundred and seven thousand four hundred and ninety-two pounds.

It will be perceived by the acknowledgment of Mr. Hardy that, in contracting with the Indians for permission to dig for lead ore and smelt the same upon their lands, he acted in violation of law inhibiting all intercourse and trade with them, without permission from the General Government; if not so expressly enacted, certainly contrary to the spirit of the laws upon the subject. Section twelve of the act approved May 19, 1796, it would seem, reaches the case in question, an extract of which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That no purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian, or nation or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity, in law or equity, unless the same be made by treaty or convention, entered into pursuant to the Constitution," &c., with penalty for treating without authority.

On the other hand, a precedent in favor of Mr. Hardy should, I beg leave to suggest, be considered, being an act approved the 14th of August, 1848, for the relief of John P. B. and the legal representatives of Henry Gratiot, their claim being precisely of a similar character to that presented by Mr. Hardy.

I herewith return, inclosed, the petition which accompanied your letter.

With much respect, your most obedient servant,

J. BUTTERFIELD, Commissioner.

HON. J. R. J. DANIEL, Chairman of Committee of Claims, House of Representatives.

Exhibit of rent lead paid by Joseph Hardy to agents of the United States, prior to the ratification of the treaty of Prairie du Chien, of January 2, 1830.

Amount from entries in account books of agents or superintendents, corroborated by returns and abstracts:
Consolidated return for quarter ending December 31, 1826, is..... 11,221 lbs.
Consolidated returns for March 31, 1827..... 2,788 " Consolidated returns for month of May..... 6,176 "

From abstracts and returns alone..... 20,185 "
..... 87,307 "

Making a total of..... 107,492 "

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 21, 1850.

Mr. STUART. It seems to me that the principle on which this bill is recommended, is hardly a safe one; but I see by the report that another bill of a similar character is said to have already passed Congress. We have, however, never admitted the doctrine that the Indians have any absolute right to the lands at all. They have no title, nothing that they can lease, nothing that they can dispose of. As the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office states, it was a penal offense to make any bargain with them in regard to their lands at the time this lease was made. It seems, too, that this was done at a time when negotiations were pending, or contemplated; negotiations were immediately afterwards completed, by which the Indians were removed from the land. This is a very considerable amount, and it does not seem to me that any principle of equity exists in the case at all. All know that the business of lead mining at that day was a very lucrative one, one out of which a great deal of money was made; and there is nothing in these papers that goes to show that it was not so. This bill now proposes to pay, I think it is, one hundred and seven thousand pounds—

Mr. JONES. Of lead only.

Mr. STUART. But that is the statement of the amount to be paid.

Mr. JONES. That much lead ore.

Mr. STUART. It seems to me, that whatever be the amount, the principle is one which it will not do for the Congress of the United States to sanction. As I said, we do not admit that the Indians have any absolute right to the country they occupy at all; we have always denied it; but in the spirit of guardian and ward, we have dealt liberally and generously with them when they are removed from any particular portion of our country, and it is opened to occupation by the whites. It seems to me, this principle should not be violated, and that the policy of the intercourse laws with the Indians should not be violated either.

I call the attention of the Senate to the facts; and I shall ask the privilege of recording my own vote against the bill. I hope, therefore, that the yeas and nays will be taken upon its passage.

Mr. JONES. I happen to have been a resident of the country occupied by Mr. Hardy and these Indians, at the time that he paid this rent. These people were required to pay rent to the United States Government for working the lead mines, while at the same time they were paying the Indians for the same thing; and I believe that if any people in the world have a just claim on the Government of the United States for the refunding of money improperly exacted from them, the smelters who occupied this country at that time are entitled to be paid the rent exacted of them by the Government, as the Gratiots have already been. I know, sir, that but for the friendly feelings the Indians had for the Gratiots, and the other smelters in that region, who exercised great influence over them, war, in all probability, would have existed in the country before it did. The purchase of the country south of these lead mines from the Sacs and Foxes in Illinois, brought on what was called the Black Hawk war. If the Indians had not been kept quiet and friendly by the smelters, who occupied these lead mines, and who paid rent to the Indians themselves, in the shape of balls, powder, stroud, pork, flour, &c., we should have been involved in war much sooner than we were. They made these payments to the Indians in good faith, and paid them a full compensation, as much for the right to trade with them, and to work their lead mines, in proportion, as those traders do who buy their furs from them, and who are not, and never have been, required by the Government of the United States to pay any rents or any duties to the Government for the privilege of trading with the Indians anywhere.

I resided in this country in the year 1827. I was acquainted, I believe, with Mr. Hardy, and I was intimately acquainted with the Gratiots. I know they paid full compensation for the privilege of working these mines, and I believe this money ought to be refunded to them. It ought long since to have been refunded to them. It ought now to be refunded with interest, in my opinion.

The Senator from Michigan says that at the time these gentlemen were occupying this country, negotiations were going on for a treaty. I was there, and know that was not exactly the case. The treaty was not made at Prairie du Chien until 1830. Some of these gentlemen went there as early as 1822; the Gratiots went there as early, I believe, as 1822.

The Senator from Michigan says the amount is a large one. It is a large one in pounds of lead, I admit. But, sir, the burden was exceedingly onerous on these smelters, because they paid a heavy rent to the Indians in the first place, and then were required to pay ten per cent. to the United States, by their agent, Martin Thomas, who had no authority even from the Government to exact rent from the miners at that time. They paid this high rent at a time when lead was exceedingly low. It sold as low as $1 25 per hundred pounds at Galena, at the very time they were required to pay this heavy rent. I know that some of the most wealthy men in the country were broken down because of these exactions by the Government of the United States. They were absolutely bankrupted, and made to suffer very much in consequence of it. Among them was the late distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Governor Dodge. He was one of the men who settled in this country, and who worked these lead mines by permission from the Indians. The Indians became very much attached to him because he was kind to them, but at the same time they feared him. They permitted him to work the mines. He, too, paid them large sums of money in the way of pork, flour, provisions, powder, clothing, blankets, &c. These men were actually of great service to the Indians; and although perhaps the Indians had no right to make treaties with them, (and I admit that they had not under our system,) they did agree to allow these men to work the lead mines, and the arrangement was made with them in good faith, and for the sake of keeping the peace. I believe the white people could have taken possession of the country vi et armis, and could have worked the mines in defiance of the Indians; but they chose not to do so, and preferred to deal peaceably with them, and to be generous to them. I hope the bill of the Senator from Missouri will be passed. It ought long since to have been passed; and I hope Mr. Hardy will be paid interest. I do not know whether he asks for interest or not; but if he does not, he ought to ask for it.

Mr. STUART. I have no disposition to prolong this debate; but the Senator from Iowa must be mistaken in one respect, or else the papers which have been read are erroneous. This application is for payments made about a year immediately preceding the making of the treaty of Prairie du Chien. Therefore, I say that negotiations must either have been actually pending or they must have been in immediate contemplation. But, sir, the Senator does not answer the points I made. The law prohibited any bargaining of this kind with the Indians; and for what purpose? For the very purpose of preventing what the Senator says there was danger of—war. We all know, who know anything about Indians, that one of the most fruitful sources of difficulties with them grows out of the instigations of white men, who get into their midst and induce them to come into conflict with the white people, for the purpose of making money to these very same men when a peace is negotiated. Hence, the policy of the law is to keep these men out with their traffic, with their powder, their blankets, and their whisky, and with everything else that can contaminate the Indians or alienate their feelings from the Government of the United States. That law was violated; violated by these men.

Then again, sir, I stated the principle we have always held, which is violated here. But besides, there is not a single statement in this case, that I have heard of, which goes to show that these claimants have any equity at all. They base their claim upon the ground that they made a bargain with the Indians, and paid them; and that they were thereafter compelled to pay the United States; and hence they say that, having made the bargain with the Indians, and paid them, what they paid the United States must be refunded. There is the principle of this case, and I submit that it is a principle which the Senate cannot sanction. I am not prepared to say that a very strong case in equity of this character might not be presented; but there is none shown here. It is an old case, of long standing, and it is based upon another. The direction in the bill is to settle this claim as another claimant was settled with, and all we have here to show on the subject is a certain number of pounds of lead which they paid as rent to the United States. There is nothing in the case which goes to show that there was extortion, nothing which goes to show that there was great loss on this account. It was a business that they could have abandoned at any minute, and abandoned in compliance with the law. If they persisted in it, it is fair to presume that it was lucrative.

There is then, I repeat, sir, nothing in equity to support this bill; and it is in the very face of the law of the United States and the principles upon which we treat with the Indians. These are considerations that, with me, weigh much beyond any amount of money that may be involved in the case; because, if these precedents be set they will subsequently be resorted to as we see this single case already passed is resorted to, in order to base this upon. We do not know what were the facts in regard to the condition of this lead country at that time. We do not know how many men were dealing in the same way, nor when you will get through paying this sort of claims. It was therefore that I said to the President that I desired the yeas and nays upon this question, for I wished to record my vote against the bill, involving, as I believe it does, a very dangerous principle.

Mr. IVERSON. I see it lacks only two or three minutes of the time at which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] yesterday gave notice of his intention to call up the Kansas bill. I therefore propose to move that this bill be postponed until to-morrow. I desire to make some remarks, as I submitted the report in favor of it. I think I can successfully answer the objections the Senator from Michigan has presented, but I have no time to do it now. I am not disposed to go into the argument and to be cut short. I therefore move to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportations of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad, from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to offer another amendment to the bill, in the second section, line nine, to strike out the word "ten" and insert "twelve," so that it will read, "shall not exceed twelve years." I am instructed by the select committee to offer this amendment. The bidder is to complete the road within twelve years instead of ten years of the execution of the contract. That is the effect of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. WADE. I desire to ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senator from California what has become of all the amendments that were offered?

Mr. HAMLIN. They have been adopted.

Mr. PUGH. But there were several substitutes printed. I believe the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] had one. I have not seen it offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair is not aware that any substitute has been offered. The Chair remembers that the Senator from Mississippi presented a bill in the form of a substitute to be offered by him. The individual now occupying the chair also presented another substitute to be offered in a certain contingency, which, however, is not now likely to arise, in the opinion of the Chair, and it will not probably be offered. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] has the floor.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator from Connecticut give me the floor to move to postpone this subject until to-morrow, and take up the Kansas bill?

Mr. GWIN. I hope it will not be passed over until to-morrow. I think the Kansas question can soon be disposed of.

Mr. GREEN. Then let us pass over this bill informally.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope the Pacific railroad bill will be postponed until to-morrow. I ask it as a favor to me; I have some very important amendments which I wish to offer; I have them not altogether prepared yet; I have them partially made up, but I have left them at my quarters; I did not bring them, not anticipating that the bill would be pressed to-day. I move to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say, too, that I have had the honor to submit an amendment to this bill as a substitute, which I am not yet prepared to present, but I shall be in a short time.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make a suggestion. The Senator from Connecticut has an amendment, to which there will be no objection. I hope we shall make some little progress to-day, and act on his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, which has been returned from the House of Representatives, with a message announcing their adherence to their amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. KING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the motion subject to division? I understood the motion to be to insist, and ask for a conference. Cannot it be divided? Is not the first question on insisting?

Mr. GREEN. I had thought, from the parliamentary law, that two distinct motions would have been proper; but I have advised with older and more experienced members, and they inform me that the customary method is to insist and ask for a conference at once by one motion. I have no objection either way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator from Rhode Island that the motion made by the Senator from Missouri is strictly in order. To insist simply, without asking for a conference, would accomplish nothing. Hence a motion to insist and ask for a committee of conference is the proper motion.

Mr. PUGH. I think there is some doubt about that. I have no doubt that it is perfectly in order for us to ask for a conference with the House of Representatives at any stage of a bill. We can do it after the first reading; we can confer with the House of Representatives at any time; but I understand the House has adhered, and I do not think it is proper to insist after an adherence. I know it was done once in the case of the Army appropriation bill; but that bill finally failed, at all events, and I do not think there can be any other precedent found. I should like some of the gentlemen with whom the Senator from Missouri says he has consulted, to inform me how it is that we can insist, after the other House has adhered? An adherence, as I understand it, is a distinct notification to us that the other House will not admit any amendment of their propositions; for I do not see how they can amend it after they have adhered to it, any more than they can amend a bill that has long since passed and gone out of their possession. I submit to the Senator from Missouri that his proper course would be, as I understand, simply to ask for a committee of conference, leaving out the insisting. I am not strenuous about it, but I should like to understand how it is that we can insist, after an adherence by the other House.

Mr. GREEN. There is no difficulty upon the right of the Senate to insist; and, moreover, it is the duty of the Senate to insist before they ask for a conference; and insisting, they then desire to confer with the House of Representatives to see what can be done by a mutual interchange of opinion. It is competent for the Senate then to adhere to their former position; and both Houses adhering, any further proposition of conference would be cut off. Even after the House has, by resolution, determined to adhere, it is proper for that House to yield to our proposition to confer. The contrary was once held, as I find on reference to the Manual; but the subsequent practice has been, not only here but also in the Parliament of England, to admit a conference after a resolution to adhere. It is not necessary to read the cases.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator does not seem to notice my distinction. If an adherence cuts off the bill, then it is cut off at the other end, as I think, as effectually cut off as if it were cut off at both ends. I do not see how the House of Representatives can admit any amendment after an adherence; but I may be wrong about that. I admit that it is competent to have a conference after an adherence on the one side; but what is the purpose of that conference? And herein comes the distinction, where I think the Senator will find that his motion will get him into trouble. When we insist and ask for a conference, we take the bill and give it to the other House, and then the first vote comes in the other House, because the Senate takes action positively; the Senate insists and asks for a conference, and our conferees give the bill to the other conferees, to be taken, first, to the House; but if we leave the bill here, and simply ask for a conference, our conferees come back and report to us, and we take the first vote. We can have a conference before receding, or before adhering. Either of those things we can now do. We can either recede or adhere, or we can have a conference before we take a vote on either proposition; but if we insist and ask for a conference, we have to leave the bill with the conferees of the other House; and what vote can they take with it? They have already voted to adhere. As I said, there is but one precedent that I know of, and that is the case of the second Army appropriation bill of the last Congress; it was the second taken up at the extra session; it was the old bill of the former session. On that bill there had been, I think, three committees of conference at the regular session, and it came to the extra session. The House of Representatives adhered, and sent notice to us, and I believe we insisted; I did not pay attention to the words of the motion; at all events, we asked for a conference, and then we adhered ourselves. The bill never became a law—the House did not recede. I say it is in order to have a conference after an adherence on the other side; but I do not think it is in order to insist, and therefore I submit that the Senator's motion ought to be simply to ask for a conference.

Mr. HUNTER. Since I have been here, sir, the invariable course has been to insist and to ask for a committee of conference. Nor have I ever known a case when the motion was divided. Indeed, I have inclined to suppose that it was indivisible. On that point, however, I will not express any positive opinion. I know it is unusual; I have known of no such instance in either House. The Senator from Ohio asks what is the use of insisting and asking for a conference, if the other House has adhered. He seems to think that by adhering, the other House has put an end to the bill. Not so, sir. If we insist and ask for a conference, the result may be that the other House may recede, and that was the precise result, as well as I recollect, in the case of the Army bill. After several conferences, the House of Representatives did recede from its adherence. It is true that the adherence of the House may put an end to an amendment, or to any change of their amendment, though I hardly think it does that. I believe the two committees may meet together and propose an amendment. Certain it is that the House can recede from its amendment, and if it does so, the original bill passes. Therefore, sir, there is an object in insisting and asking for a committee of conference, nor am I aware that that motion has ever been divided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The seventeenth joint rule determines that. It requires the adherence of both Houses to destroy a bill. The simple adherence of one does not defeat a bill.

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly; so I understand.
Mr. GREEN. I find in the Manual what I will read to the Senator from Ohio:

"And on another occasion the Lords made it an objection that the Commons had asked a free conference after they had made resolutions of adhering. It was then affirmed, however, on the part of the Commons, that nothing was more parliamentary than to proceed with free conferences after adhering, (3 Hats., 269.) and we do, in fact, see instances of conference, or of free conference, asked after the resolution of disagreeing."

It refers to a number of cases "of insisting," "of adhering," and even "of a second or final adherence."

A conference can even then be had.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggested a division of this question, and it struck me as very proper, because I did not know how to vote upon the motion as it was made. It was a motion to insist, and ask for a conference. I may be against insisting, but in favor of asking for a conference, and vice versa. I cannot vote upon the motion so as to suit myself.

Mr. GREEN. To accommodate the Senator, I will make two motions; first, to insist, and then to ask a conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the motion can only be varied by unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to taking them together.

Mr. PUGH. The motion now is to insist, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To insist, and ask for a conference, was the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DOUGLAS. He modifies it, so as to make it only to insist.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object to the modification.

Mr. GREEN. It is objected to, and I have not the privilege; very well.

Mr. PUGH. Do I understand the Chair to decide that it is in order to move to insist? I have not succeeded in making the Senator from Missouri understand me. I understand it is in order to ask for a conference. I have not denied that at all; but I say it is not in order, as I understand it, to insist, and the paragraph which the Senator from Missouri read, seems to me to verify what I said before. I will read from the Manual:

"A conference may be asked, before the House asking it has come to a resolution of disagreement, insisting, or adhering."

A conference may be asked before any vote.

"In which case the papers are not left with the other conferees, but are brought back to be the foundation of the vote to be given."

Therefore we may have a conference with the other House, if they grant it, and we bring the papers back here; and then we can vote either to recede or adhere. All that the Senator has read is, that there may be a conference after the other House has adhered, and before we adhere; but how, in the name of common sense, I ask, after the House has adhered, do we go on to insist? I am opposed to this motion to insist, but I am willing to vote for a conference; and if the motion is pressed, I shall feel bound, with my views of what the rules of order are, to vote against the first branch of the proposition; but I am perfectly willing to have the latter one carried.

Mr. MASON. If I understand the Senator from Ohio correctly, the point of his objection is, that if we insist, and at the same time ask for a conference, the effect of it will be to leave the bill in the possession of the other House.

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. I do not see that there is any such objection to that as would affect at all the steps which we may think it proper to take. Suppose the bill is left in the possession of the other House, as doubtless it will be if the motion prevails; then it will be competent to the other House to proceed with it at that stage, or to drop it altogether; and if they choose to do it, the responsibility is upon them. We could not interpose in any way, I should think; or if we could, I doubt if we ought to interpose in any way; it would be obtrusive, by any indirect mode to endeavor to shield that House from the responsibility that belongs to it.

I confess, sir, that I heard with very great regret the message which is now before us from the other House, communicating to us its first action upon the disagreement between the two Houses. Its determination to adhere to its bill in the form of an amendment was a very significant determination, if not a very ominous one; and although I shall vote very cheerfully (and I am gratified that my honorable friend from Missouri has made this motion) to insist, in lieu of a motion to adhere on the part of the Senate, yet I do it only from an earnest desire, if it can be done, to promote the great public interest of the country by passing the bill which I consider carries out the sense of the people of Kansas for the admission of that State into the Union without any intervention on behalf of Congress. Even if my fears were stronger than my hopes, I should still deem it a duty to the country to leave nothing undone to preserve harmony between the two Houses by the most courteous form of usage on our part, and that would be a motion to insist, and not to adhere. If the motion to insist prevails, accompanied by a proposition for a conference, the result will be, I take for granted, as said by the Senator from Ohio, to send the bill back to the House of Representatives, and to leave it in their possession for their action upon it.

Now, they can do one of two things. They have adhered, which I understand in parliamentary language means, as the sense of the House adhering, that they mean to stand upon what they have done. But there is no parliamentary reason why they should not revoke that decision, and recede from what they have done. If the bill be sent back to the House of Representatives upon our motion to insist, although it will be in their possession, they can vote to refuse the conference, if, in their judgment, they think it expedient and wise to do so. If they do refuse a conference, they stand upon their adherence; and it will be then for the Senate to determine whether it too will adhere, and thus put an end to the bill, or whether it will insist, and again ask for a conference.

But I think, sir, considering the great interest, and the consequences which are dependent upon the result of this measure, that the Senate should leave nothing undone to preserve courtesy between the two Houses; and, if possible, to dispose in some manner of this great measure, for great it certainly is in its future consequences; or, if it cannot be done, that the Senate should preserve itself in a condition to leave the responsibility of its loss where that responsibility belongs. For one, therefore, I will go with Senators cheerfully to the extremest verge of parliamentary courtesy, to keep this matter alive as long as there is a hope of admitting the State of Kansas in the form provided by the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I do not see that there is anything serious in the difficulty presented by the Senator from Ohio. The course which I have proposed is but a regular step in the natural progression of events, and I find that it harmonizes precisely with the Manual, which gives this account of the proceedings between the two Houses of Parliament:

"When either House, e. g., the House of Commons, send a bill to the other, the other may pass it with amendments. The regular progression in this case is, that the Commons disagree to the amendment; the Lords insist on it; the Commons insist on their disagreement; the Lords adhere to their amendment; the Commons adhere to their disagreement. The term of insisting may be repeated as often as they choose to keep the question open. But the first adherence by either renders it necessary for the other to recede or adhere also;"— that was the old law—

"when the matter is usually suffered to fall. (10 Gray, 148.) Latterly, however, there are instances of their having gone to a second adherence. There must be an absolute conclusion of the subject somewhere, or otherwise transactions between the Houses would become endless. (3 Hats., 268, 270.) The term of insisting, we are told by Sir John Trevor, was then (1679) newly introduced into parliamentary usage, by the Lords. (7 Grey, 94.) It was certainly a happy innovation, as it multiplies the opportunities of trying modifications which may bring the Houses to a concurrence. Either House, however, is free to pass over the terms of insisting, and to adhere in the first instance; (10 Grey, 146;) but it is not respectful to the other. In the ordinary parliamentary course, there are two free concessions, at least, before an adherence. (10 Grey, 147.)"

It requires a mutual adherence between the two Houses before the bill is lost. Insisting is a respectful course to the other House. It is simply notifying them that we see no reason yet to change, and are desirous of having a conference to interchange opinions on the subject.

Mr. STUART. I have no disposition to go on with this discussion; but there are certain principles governing our practice which I think ought to be set right. There is but one question which is divisible in itself, and which our rule prevents the division of on the suggestion of a single member. By our rules a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible; but any other question which in itself is divisible, that is to say, which being divided, one proposition may stand and the other fall, is divisible by parliamentary law, and must be divided upon the demand of any Senator who requires it. Now, in this case, the Senate may insist and refuse a conference. They may refuse to insist and provide for a conference. Hence it is a divisible motion. The Senator from Virginia says he has not seen an instance—

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator show how we may refuse to insist and then ask for a conference? If you refuse to insist, there is no conference.

Mr. GREEN. It is equivalent to receding.

Mr. STUART. No, sir; refusing to insist is not equivalent to receding. A motion would still be necessary to recede before the amendment adopted by the House of Representatives would be agreed to by the Senate. Suppose the motion be to adhere; the Senate may refuse it. The Senator from Virginia will see that any other motion is still open in respect to the bill. There may undoubtedly be a conference on the bill as it stands. One may be asked for by the Senate. But I was speaking to the point, and I think it will be found on examination of parliamentary law, that there is no exception to the divisibility of a question which in itself may be divided, except the one I have referred to in our rules. I do not make these remarks because I ask for any division; but the Senator from Rhode Island does.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdrew that request some time ago.

Mr. STUART. Again, the Senator from Virginia says, we may repeat these propositions for a conference as often as we choose to the other House. I think he is mistaken. It is not strictly respectful, according to parliamentary law, for one House to ask a conference after the other has adhered, because adherence is notice, in parliamentary form, to the other House, that the House adhering does not intend to yield at all; that it insists on its own proposition or nothing; and, as the authorities say, there must at some time be an end to the proceeding. If you adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, there never can be an end, unless the House insisting chooses to make it; but you may repeat a proposition for a conference to the House adhering, as often as you choose, however offensive it may be to them, they steadily rejecting it. If this doctrine be right, there would never be an end of a measure.

I have examined the authorities. The text of the Manual which has been read is not borne out by the authorities to which it refers. Those references to Hatsell do not exist in Hatsell at all. The true position of matters of this kind was stated in a report made by Mr. Van Buren some years ago. Although it is significant, when one House adheres, that they do not intend to vary their action, yet you may ask them to confer and they may refuse it; but if they do refuse it that is an end of the question. It was an end in that case. The House of Representatives asked for a conference. Mr. Van Buren, as chairman of the committee, reported against it, and the Senate, having adhered, they refused the conference, and that was the end of the measure. You see, Mr. President, that that must be an end, or else, as I said, one House could keep a question open through the entire session.

I have made these suggestions merely that our own notions in regard to the action between the two Houses should be corrected; not because I have any desire to delay the matter. I am ready to vote on the question.

Mr. BAYARD. There are many remarks of the honorable Senator from Michigan to which I can offer no objection; but I should like him to state his authority for the position that it is disrespectful to the House of Representatives for the Senate to ask a conference after the House have voted to adhere.

Mr. STUART. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say that.

Mr. BAYARD. Those were the words.

Mr. STUART. No, sir; I said it was not entirely respectful, though it had been done, and it might be done.

Mr. BAYARD. "Not entirely respectful" seems to me to mean "somewhat disrespectful." I can attach no other meaning to the language. I can find in no parliamentary authority any doctrine of that kind; but it is laid down that where either body in the first instance adheres, instead of insisting, and asking for a conference, or simply insisting, and leaving the other to ask for a conference, is considered disrespectful. The disrespect in this case, then, comes from the House of Representatives, who, on the first difference between them and the Senate, the Senate disagreeing to their amendment, without a single precedent, I think, to sustain them, adhere in the first instance. That does not prevent our action, however. It does not prevent us from insisting on our amendment, and asking for a conference. It only puts them, in my judgment, still further in the wrong. It only shows a more determined intention on their part not to take the possible chance of a conclusion of this matter by an agreement between the two Houses.

I am in favor of insisting, and asking for a committee of conference; and I see no impropriety in it. There can be no doubt that if each House adheres, if we adhere and the House of Representatives adhere, the bill is gone, under all parliamentary law. But the House of Representatives having adhered, if we insist, and ask for a committee of conference, it will be for them to say whether they will grant it or not. If they refuse it, what the ulterior effect will be, whether that finally determines the question as regards the Senate, or whether we have a right to ask for a second conference after the first refusal, or whether, having the right, we should go that far, are distinct questions, not necessary to be mooted now. In the present case, although I think the action of the House of Representatives precipitate in adhering, and not respectful according to parliamentary usage; yet, as the question is one of moment, I am disposed, on the part of the Senate, to insist, and ask for a committee of conference, to see, if possible, whether this question can be determined through a medium of that kind.

Mr. BROWN. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, as I understand it. I suppose, Mr. President, there can be no difficulty, so far as the parliamentary law is concerned, on that point. That the Senate has the right, if it chooses, to insist, and ask for a committee of conference, I take it for granted is admitted on all hands; there can be no question of that.

Mr. PUGH. That is the very point I make. I say we cannot insist after an adherence on the other side.

Mr. BROWN. Then, sir, all the writers on parliamentary law, I think, are mistaken. I have no sort of question about the point myself. On the subject of its being not respectful, raised by the Senator from Michigan, I am quite free to say that I do not think it is quite respectful to ourselves. If the House of Representatives thinks proper, on the very first instant, to adhere to its amendment, and thereby indicate to us that it does not even want to confer on the subject, we might, if we thought proper, get into a huff and say, "if you thus oppose yourselves against us, we will stand out also." But upon a great question of public interest and public concern, we are scarcely permitted to consult our personal feelings. If each individual member could act upon the impulses of his own mind, the Senate might very likely resent this captiousness, to call it by no harsher term; but we are here to act not for ourselves, nor upon our personal impulses, but for the great and substantial interests of the country; and though I do not think it quite respectful to ourselves to insist, after the prompt adherence of the other House, I will do it. I might not insist a second time; I certainly would not insist after all hope of success had failed; but I am not willing to consult my personal feelings, my pride of sentiment, when the great public interest is at stake. The House of Representatives may, possibly it will—I have some hope that it will upon further reflection—grant the conference, and when the bill goes back, the whole question is opened by the report of its committee. No receding from its adherence is at all necessary. That will be overrode by its own action in agreeing to the conference; but if it refuse the conference, then the Senate may ask for a conference again, and may urge the question. I should be against doing it myself; still it might be done. Instances have occurred, I think, where it has been done; but there is no question before the Senate except the motion made by the Senator from Missouri, and as there seems to be no doubt that he has the right to submit the motion, I suppose now we can have the vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I desire to see if there is anything here for us to debate. I understand my friend from Ohio raises the question whether we can insist after the House of Representatives has adhered. The Chair decides that we can. The Senator does not appeal, and of course there is no question before us now except on the motion of the Senator from Missouri. I hope we shall vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was aware that there was no question before the Senate, except the one on which the yeas and nays were called. With the usual freedom and toleration of debate among Senators, he has permitted this discussion for the purpose of allowing Senators to throw light on the question before the Senate. The question now pending is the motion of the Senator from Missouri, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered; which is, that the Senate insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—24.

So the motion to insist and ask for a committee of conference was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee of conference be appointed?

Mr. GWIN, and others. By the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Messrs. GREEN, HUNTER, and SEWARD as the committee on the part of the Senate.

TELEGRAPH TO UTAH.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the bill (S. No. 211) to facilitate communication with the Army in Utah.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to contract for the extension and use of the American electro-magnetic telegraph from the frontiers of Missouri or Iowa to such western military posts as he may deem necessary for the public service; for which purpose it appropriates such sum of money as may be found necessary, not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to propose a substitute for the bill—to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the extension and use of an electric telegraph from the frontiers of Missouri or Iowa to such military posts as he may deem necessary for the public service; the said contract to provide for the management and working of said telegraph by private enterprise, after the necessity for such means of communication with the Army in Utah shall have ceased; and that said telegraph shall not cost, in the aggregate, more than the sum of five hundred thousand dollars to Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, and not exceeding a proportionate part of said sum for such portions of such telegraph as shall be constructed; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum of money as may be found necessary, not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, to carry into execution the purposes of this act.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether this substitute, which he has offered as an amendment, has undergone the revision of the Committee on Military Affairs, as I understand the original bill to have been reported from that committee?

Mr. WILSON. The substitute I propose myself; it has not undergone the examination of the committee. I will explain it, however. It is more carefully guarded than the original bill, limiting the cost to Salt Lake City to $500,000; and if the line should not go so far as that, providing that its cost shall only be in that proportion. It is really a check, suggested by Senators who thought the original bill was too indefinite.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he has any reliable data on which to form an estimate of the actual cost of the telegraph as proposed by the bill?

Mr. WILSON. I will state very briefly to the Senate the information I have in regard to the matter. Some weeks ago, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] presented the petition of Mr.

O'Reilly and his associates, proposing to build a telegraph from the Missouri river to the army in Utah. They estimate that it can be built, from the Missouri river to where the army is, between one thousand and eleven hundred miles, for from three hundred and fifty thousand to five hundred thousand dollars. They say they can lay down this telegraph under ground in one hundred days, so that within that time we can be connected with the army. The substitute proposes to build a telegraph from the Missouri river to Salt Lake, a distance of about twelve hundred miles, and appropriates a sum not to exceed $500,000, or in that proportion for any portion of the route. This limits it, so that the $500,000 shall cover the entire expenditure to Salt Lake; and it cannot cost more than in that proportion as far as it may be constructed. It is, in effect, a limitation upon the original bill, and as such, I take it, will meet with the approbation of the Senator from North Carolina and every other Senator.

The parties, in their original petition, say they can complete this telegraph to Salt Lake in one hundred days; that they can put it underground where they think it will be safe. The substitute, however, provides that the Secretary of War can make a contract with any parties. It does not limit him to a contract with the original petitioners, but leaves him at liberty to make a contract with any persons in the country. The Secretary of War was written to in regard to this matter. In his annual report in the early part of the session, he advocated the establishment of a line of telegraph to the Pacific ocean, and said:

"A line of stockade posts upon two of these routes would not require a very large force to maintain them, and if placed at proper distances apart, would furnish certain means of a safe and rapid transportation of the mails, and perfect protection to a telegraph line from one ocean to the other, which latter object would, in itself, be worth far more to the country than the cost of the posts, and the expense of maintaining them."

The committee to whom this petition was referred, called on the Secretary of War for his opinions in regard to the prayer of the petition, and in answer to the committee, the Secretary of War says:

"The advantage which the Government would derive from a line of telegraphic communication, in successful operation from Fort Laramie, and beyond that point, cannot well be overestimated. Such a line can be laid down at a comparatively small cost, with great expedition, and in such a manner as to secure it, in a great measure, against the danger of any interruption from the Indians along the route; and, if once constructed and established, it could, at a moderate cost, be kept up."

"Desirable as this enterprise would be at all times, as a means of transmitting intelligence, it rises, under the present state of things, to an importance that can scarcely be overestimated. I cannot express too strongly my high estimation of its great value to the public service, and recommend it earnestly to the favorable consideration of your honorable committee."

In accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, the committee ordered the bill to be reported to the Senate; and it is now before us. I have moved the substitute for the bill which puts limitations upon it, and I think makes a marked improvement in it, which I hope will meet the approbation of all Senators.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Massachusetts, I think, has omitted to state one other difference between the original bill and his substitute, which in my judgment renders the substitute very much more desirable. The bill as it was originally reported, provided that the Secretary of War should contract for the use of the American electrico-magnetic telegraph. That telegraph is used by one particular company; and the Secretary of War would, by the terms of the original bill, have been confined expressly in his contract to that company. The substitute provides that he may contract for any electric telegraph, leaving the matter open to competition by all, and lessening the cost of the work, which must necessarily be the case, where competition arises between the various companies. That difference, I think, renders the substitute much more desirable than the original bill.

Mr. BIGGS. If I understand the Senator from Massachusetts correctly in the explanation he has given of his substitute, it is, in substance, an appropriation of $500,000 to construct a telegraph from the Missouri river to Salt Lake City. That is contemplated as the amount that the work will, in all probability, cost. That sum is to be expended on the work; and the work is to be done in one hundred days. It is believed by these telegraph men, that in one hundred days they can expend $500,000 in laying down a telegraphic line from the Missouri river, a distance of twelve hundred miles. If it is to communicate with the army in Utah, it certainly should be done expeditiously; and we are told it can be done in one hundred days. Then these parties are to put down a telegraphic line for twelve hundred miles, and we are to pay them out of the public Treasury $500,000, which, if I understand the matter correctly, is at any rate as much as the whole cost of putting down the line; and then, after it is constructed, if we do not need it any longer for the purposes of the army in Utah, these parties are to have the use of it on such terms as may be agreed upon between the War Department and the telegraph operators. The substance of it then is, that we are called upon to expend out of the public Treasury $500,000 to construct a telegraph line that may be needed two months, or one month, or twenty days, and as soon as it is in operation, and the Government does not need it, we are to give it away. We are to expend $500,000 on this work, and when it is completed, we are to give it away. That is the proposition before the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. It is due to the Committee on Military Affairs to state the facts connected with the report of this bill to the Senate. When the memorial of these parties was referred to the committee, we addressed the Secretary of War on the subject, and asked his opinion as to the propriety and policy of this measure. When his answer was received, the question was taken up in committee, with six members present, the chairman being sick and unable to attend. The committee were equally divided upon this bill. Three of them were opposed to it. I was one of that number; and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. FITZPATRICK] agreed with me. The other three members of the committee were in favor of the bill. As a matter of courtesy, although those of us who opposed it might have defeated the bill in committee, we consented that it might be reported to the Senate, in order that the sense of the Senate might be had upon the question. Although we were decidedly opposed to the bill, and our negative votes would have prevented its being reported to the Senate, we did not consider it fair, on a question of so much importance as this, to prevent the bill being brought into the Senate; but we were willing that this body should have an opportunity of deciding it upon its merits. We therefore yielded our objection, and consented that the bill might be reported.

But, sir, the objection which I entertained in the committee to the passage of this bill, has not been diminished by time and reflection. The bill is one of importance, involving the expenditure of a large amount of money; and I fear that the temper of the Senate is not such as to listen to any debate on a question of this kind now; and I doubt very much whether it will be distinctly understood. I shall proceed, however, briefly to state the reasons why I cannot support the bill.

The proposition is that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to enter into a contract for a sum not exceeding half a million of dollars, to put down a line of telegraph from some point on the confines of Missouri or Iowa to Salt Lake City. The object to be accomplished is to facilitate communication with the army in Utah, during its operations in that Territory. As the Senator from North Carolina has very properly remarked, it may be that in less than twenty days from the time this telegraph is completed, the Government may have no earthly use for it. Indeed, I do not anticipate that the Government will have any use for it at any time. These parties say they can put down the wire in one hundred days; but what guarantee have we that it will be performed in that time? Certainly, if they can put down this wire, which, of itself, is a very unimportant thing, so far as the cost is concerned, with such force as they can work with in a hundred days, half a million of dollars is ten times the value of the undertaking. Not more than six or eight or a dozen persons can work at it; and if they put the wire underground they will go along with half a dozen or a dozen men with shovels, digging up the ground, and dropping into it the wire, by a carriage and reel. It may be a rapid work, and doubtless it is a rapid process. It may be that they can put down twelve hundred miles of wire in one hundred days; but I say that if they can do it with the amount of labor required, and the expense incident to it, $100,000 would be a vast sum for any such enterprise; and yet it is proposed by this bill to give this company $500,000.

But, sir, they do not pretend to say that they can do it in less than a hundred days, and it may take a longer time. The result may be, if you enter into this contract, binding the Government to expend $500,000 for the construction of this work, that long before the telegraph can be put into a condition to be used by the Government, so as to be beneficial to it, the exigency for its use will have passed by; and I think, from the indications I have seen, that the Government will have no use whatever for this work after it is completed, if it takes a hundred days to complete it. In consequence of the additional force which Congress has given to the President to be used in Utah, I can anticipate no other result but that if difficulties occur in Utah, they will be ended in less than one hundred days from this time. If the Government sends into Utah a sufficient force to overawe the Mormon people, as I believe it will do—as it now has it in its power to do—and as I have no doubt the Government is preparing to do—then the war with Utah will end long before the expiration of one hundred days from this time. We now understand that General Johnston, who is in command of the Utah army, expects to be at Salt Lake in the month of June. He will be able to march from his present encampment early in May, as soon as supplies reach him, and they are already en route to him. As soon as these supplies reach him he anticipates making an entrance into the valley of Salt Lake, and he does not seem to apprehend any difficulty in suppressing the Mormon insurrection. He appears to be confident that, even with his present force, he will be able to quell it. But when the reinforcements join him which the Government has already sent, or will send in a few days—and one or two regiments are to leave Leavenworth on the 20th of this month, now within a few days—when these reinforcements reach General Johnston, in the early part of next month—giving to him an available force of four or five thousand men—there will be no earthly difficulty in suppressing the Mormon insurrection, if an insurrection actually exists.

Sir, the Mormon war will be ended before this telegraph can ever reach the Rocky Mountains, I care not how much expedition may be exerted in the construction of the work. If the Government use that energy and spirit which I think characterize the War Department, and which I believe will be infused into the Army and into all the operations of Government in relation to this war, I have confidence that the Mormon war will be terminated long before this telegraph line reaches Salt Lake; and after the war is ended, of what value will it be to the Government? None, sir. And, I ask, what value will it be to the Government even if the war continues? You may make telegraphic communication, but can you send supplies or troops by telegraph? Can you send wagons by telegraph? No, sir; all the supplies will have to be taken by land, by the slow but regular and certain process of wheels, carriages, and men on foot and on horseback. You may notify the army in Utah that reinforcements are coming, that supplies are coming, and that may possibly be cheering to the army there to learn; but will it bring the supplies any sooner than they would otherwise go there, whether you have a telegraph or not? Certainly not. Of what use will be this telegraph to the Government? It will not expedite a single military company; it will not expedite a single wagon with supplies; it will not produce the least effect, so far as I can understand or perceive, on the progress of the war, or its termination; and if the war be terminated, if the strong force which will be sent into Utah shall be sufficient to quell the insurrection, or if Brigham Young shall change his tactics and fly to the mountains and carry on a guerrilla war, of what use will this telegraph line be to the United States? Not a particle.

My objection to the bill in the first place is, that the amount demanded is far beyond the necessary amount to defray the expenses of the work. It is a stupendous amount to take—half a million dollars—out of a now diminished and depleted

Treasury for the purpose of making this experiment, for it is nothing more than an experiment, at last; for whether it will end in good, and in service to the country, is a question about which any man may have his doubts. The provision is that after the Government has done with the use of the telegraph, the very moment the Utah war is completed, then it is to be turned over to these individual speculators, and contractors, to be kept at their expense; and the result is that the Government is to expend half a million of dollars to use a telegraphic line two, three, or four months at the furthest, and then it is to be put into the hands and control of these private individuals, who construct it for their own benefit. It is nothing more nor less, in my opinion, than a scheme got up by these men to get the Government to bear the expense of putting down this telegraph line for their individual benefit. That is my idea, and that, I think, will be the result.

If they put it upon posts, it would cost less. This great expense is incident to putting the telegraph underground. Passing through a hostile country of savages, exposed, as it will be, to so many depredations and casualties, the Government must put it under ground to make it a safe conveyance of telegraphic information. It will not do to expose it to the depredations of persons who may cut it at any place within the one thousand two hundred miles. Why, sir, the Government expends two, three, or four hundred thousand dollars in erecting a telegraph upon posts; and the next day after the operators put up their wire it may be cut down by any loafer or straggler who may go along, and is disposed to be mischievous. Doubtless, if Brigham Young intends to fight the United States, and put himself in opposition to the power of this Government, he will have plenty of men along the line of the telegraph to cut the wires whenever he chooses to stop the communication of information. In my opinion, it is worse than an idle attempt on the part of the Government to get telegraphic communication to Salt Lake City, or to the army of the United States operating in Utah. The result is nothing more nor less than what I have stated. Even if they put it under ground, I want to know what is to prevent persons from cutting it if they choose. You cannot conceal it. No matter where you put it under ground, you must leave traces of its position. If you do, it is still liable to be molested by persons who are maliciously disposed, and who, from policy or any other consideration, may be disposed to stop the communication.

I do not believe it will answer the purposes which the Secretary of War and the friends of the bill seem to anticipate from it. I believe it will be an expenditure of the public money for individual use, and nothing else. I cannot conceive that the great benefits which are anticipated are to spring from it. I do not believe the Government will want this line. My impression is, my hope and belief is, that, before this wire can be put down, the Mormon war will be ended, and the exigency which is said to call for it will have terminated; and I am not willing to risk the expenditure of half a million of dollars, in the present condition of the Treasury, for the purpose of making an experiment of this sort, which may or may not prove valuable to the Government. I do not believe it will prove at all valuable. I do not think the Government will require it; and, not requiring it, it is a violation of good faith to the people that we should take this money out of the Treasury to build a telegraphic line for the benefit of private companies who may want to use their time and labor in this way. Sir, I am opposed to the bill in every shape in which it can be presented.

Mr. WILSON. The statement made by the Senator from Georgia of the action of the Military Committee is correct. I made the statement of the action of the committee when I reported the bill, and precisely as he has now given it. The committee were divided in regard to the matter. The Senator says that before this work can be accomplished we shall have no use for the telegraphic line. This may or may not be so. If we are to have war, and a great many men in this country anticipate difficulties with the Mormons, running through several months, this line, if established, and kept in working order, will put us in direct early communication with that part of our country, and, in my judgment, will be of inestimable value. If such a line now existed; if we had been connected with the army during the last four or five months, I believe it would have been of great service to the country, and I think we might have saved something by it.

This proposition, Senators say, is to give five hundred thousand dollars for the completion of this line. Now, sir, it simply authorizes the Secretary of War to make a contract that shall not exceed that sum. He may contract with these parties to build a line, and the United States own the line, or he may contract with these parties to build the line on their own account, paying them for the use of it. The Secretary of War, as strongly as human language can express an opinion, urges the establishment of this line. It will, if completed, go more than half the way from the Missouri river to California. It connects us with Salt Lake, with the central regions of the continent, and the expenditure cannot exceed half a million, and probably will not go beyond three or four hundred thousand dollars.

Objection has been made that it is building a line towards California by the central route. I do not know that there is any objection to that. In my judgment, Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States seven or eight years ago had constructed wagon roads and built a telegraphic line to California, by the central or some other route, something would have been accomplished for the country; but instead of this, we have spent seven or eight years talking about constructing a railroad to the Pacific. You may pass the bill we have before us to-day, but you will not build any railroad to the Pacific at present. I believe a Pacific railroad is a sort of necessity to the country to connect the two parts of it together. But, sir, if a man has studied the railroad system of this country and knows anything about it, I think he will come to the conclusion that you cannot build a railroad to the Pacific for less than about two hundred million dollars, and that it will take you from ten to twenty years to do it, and that when you have built such a road you could not get one hundred capitalists in the United States who would agree to run it for $3,000,000 annually and all the receipts.

Sir, I hope we shall construct this telegraph line and connect ourselves with the army. I hope the day will not be distant when a line will be completed from there by one route to San Francisco and by another to Oregon, and it can be done with little expense, and so connect us by telegraph with our possessions on the Pacific coast. I think this is a fit time to do it, and the few hundred thousand dollars that will be expended in putting us in immediate communication with the central regions of this continent, with Salt Lake, in the present condition of the army and the condition of affairs in this country, would be a wise expenditure; and believing so, I reported the bill, and shall vote for it.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, this is a bill proposing to appropriate a large sum of money, a very large sum, when we consider the present condition of the Treasury—half a million dollars. Now, sir, I believe that the appropriations which it will be necessary to make, both for the uses of the War and the Post Office Departments will be found to be very large—larger, perhaps, than the Senate will be willing to make; and when I remember this, I am unwilling to vote for anything which proposes to take, in addition to that, on a mere experiment, so large a sum of money as this. It seems to me that it cannot be justified either by a reference to the wants of the War or the Post Office Department. We certainly should not be justified in going to this expense for the purpose of affording mail facilities to that country. We are already losing largely by the means we are taking to supply them with mails. I believe that the total mail receipts there are under one thousand five hundred dollars, and we are paying seventy or eighty thousand dollars a year to furnish them with mails. I am not willing, in addition to that, to expend half a million dollars to give them a telegraph, looking to it as a permanent matter, as a permanent source of appropriation. Nor, sir, do I believe it will be necessary for this war which gentlemen talk of; nor am I willing to add to the large appropriations which necessarily must be made to supply the troops there. I quite agree with the Senator from Georgia, that they ought to be able, with the means which are already supplied, to put down any insurrection, if there should be one, in Utah. I think we shall find enough to do to furnish what it is absolutely necessary to give them, without adding this large amount to the appropriations.

It has been objected that the bill is not sufficiently guarded, and I think it is not. I think even if the scheme were justifiable for military or for postal purposes, that it would be proper to guard it more than is here done. As the Senator from North Carolina says, are we to pay the expense, and more than the expense, of making it, and then leave to these parties hereafter the profits, if there be any profit in the enterprise? Is the Government to make a telegraph for a use of twenty or one hundred days? Certainly not. There can be no justification for this. I hope we shall not try these expensive experiments until we have some more money in the Treasury than we now have.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall vote against this proposition in any shape in which it may present itself, and on what I suppose to be a very simple principle. Some time ago, I do not know how long, but I think three or four years ago, we granted leave to a certain company to construct a telegraph line to the Pacific; gave them the right of way, and allowed some years in which to do the work. It was urged very strongly on the Senate at that time that that was a matter of very great importance and necessity, and that if we gave the permission asked for, the work would be done at once, because the line would pay exceedingly well, on account of the necessity of making constant communications between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. That measure was pushed through the Senate as one of great consequence, and I voted for it myself finally, as it was urged so strongly; but I believe from that day to this we have not heard the first word about the telegraph from here to the Pacific. If a telegraphic communication to and from Utah is really worth anything, and is of any consequence to anybody, it would seem to be a little strange that no company has started in it. It is said we are to have a war out there, and that this measure is of pressing importance, and will be of value in order to enable us to carry on that war. We have not heard of the first steps to accomplish such a purpose from any private company. There is no capitalist, there is no company of capitalists, which thinks it of the slightest value in the world, or makes any movement in regard to it.

Then it resolves itself into this question: is it the mere beginning of the enterprise to make a telegraphic line to the Pacific ocean? and, if so, is it worth while for the Government of the United States to construct half of it? Is this a mere part of that scheme? Is that worthless? Are we to be called upon now to build half the line, let the company have it, and then build the other half when they see fit? That seems to be the amount of the bill.

As has been remarked, there is nothing whatever in the bill making any provision of any kind or description for any ownership of the Government in it, after expending this half a million of money, or less, as the case may be; but I believe all experience shows that we never spend less than we appropriate for these purposes. If that is to be the case, if we are to appropriate money for this purpose, and the Government is to be called upon to construct one half the line for the benefit of the company, it should have some sort of assurance that the work is to be done at some period or other, and that there is to be a permanent benefit derived from it to the Government. If it is not that, it is a mere proposition for our Government, because we have a disturbance in Utah at the present time, to expend half a million of dollars in constructing a telegraphic line for this mere temporary condition of things which may exist for a few months, as has been suggested, and may not exist even for that period of time. Why, sir, up to the present moment, Congress has not authorized, in any manner or form, by any act it has passed, these hostilities, if they may be called such, that are being had, or are now in progress against Utah. We have made no appropriations for the purpose; we have not yet passed an act recognizing that hostilities exist there, or showing that we are disposed to carry on that war, if war it may be called. As a matter of fact, it is well known that a very large portion of Congress—we do not know how much—think that the whole proceeding is entirely unnecessary, and that the troops ought to be withdrawn. How do we know that that is not the result to which we shall come?

Then, sir, as is suggested by the Senator from Georgia, and others, what possible benefit, other than the communication of interesting intelligence, once in a while, of the operations of our army, can be derived from it? To be sure, we may get a rapid account of the position of the army, and communicate rapidly with it. But everybody who has considered these matters at all ought to know that the operations of an army, at that distance, are not to be carried on in that way, by the mere transmission of events that happen from day to day. Anybody but our present Secretary of War, I apprehend, would make some sort of provision beforehand, as to troops and supplies, so as to render the army able to sustain itself at a distance of twelve hundred miles, without depending on telegraphic communications.

Now, sir, my friend from Massachusetts, and the Secretary of War, have given us their opinions that this will be of inestimable value. That is all we get from them. Where are the details? How is it to operate? Does my friend, who is on the Committee on Military Affairs, do anything more than say that he thinks it will be valuable? The Secretary of War thinks so too. I have a high opinion of the military sagacity of my friend, but I have none at all of that of the Secretary of War. If, however, they are to give their opinions, and these opinions are to be the law on which we are to appropriate half a million of money to construct a line of telegraph, not for our own use longer, possibly, than a month, into that country, let us have some specific military details. What military object is to be accomplished by it? How is it to work? How is money to be saved by it? My friend says he has no doubt money will be saved to the Government by it. How? In what particular? Where? Let us have some of the military experience of these gentlemen, to tell us in what particular manner we are to save so much money by making this appropriation. Sir, I do not think the Secretary of War knows anything about it at all. He has probably been in communication with the gentlemen who want to build this road—I mean this telegraphic line, but I confound it all the time with the Pacific railroad. It may be a part of the same thing.

Mr. GWIN. No, sir; it is very different.

Mr. FESSENDEN. At any rate, I think they are very much of the same character, in some particulars, at least at the present time. As I said, we are not given any description, or any items of account, showing of what use this telegraph line is to be, or how it is to save money to the Government, or in what respect it is to be useful to the Government. No doubt the gentlemen who want to build it have stated to the Secretary of War, and others, what they can do. But do we know anything about the actual cost of this work? Has it been under investigation by a committee, so that they can tell us what it will cost per mile, with the facilities we have for constructing this electro-magnetic telegraph line? We have heard nothing of this description; and it is perfectly idle to tell me that we may appropriate a sum not exceeding half a million of dollars, and that the person at the head of the Department, whoever he may be, who is to make the contract, will see that it is well expended. Every day's experience in the history of our Government proves, that when Congress appropriates for a particular object a sum of money not to exceed a certain amount, the whole of it goes.

Mr. FOSTER. And there is a deficiency besides.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And there is a deficiency besides, ordinarily. How do we know anything about what sort of a contract will be made? I think the whole measure is a crude, undigested, and I was about to add, certainly to me, indigestible scheme. I cannot understand it. There are no details, there are no facts, there is nothing but crude opinions upon which to found it; and in the present state of the Treasury, as my honorable friend from Virginia says, I am quite unwilling to put the power of making this contract into the hands of the Government, without knowing something more about it.

Mr. WILSON. I want to say a word to the Senator from Maine in regard to this matter of details. No human being can tell what the real advantage to the country will be from the construction of this line of telegraph. It depends very much upon the condition of affairs in that part of the country, and how long it is to continue. If this line had been constructed six months ago, and we had been in daily communication with our army there, does not the Senator believe it would have been of great service to this country? Colonel Johnston was four months without communication with the Government—without hearing from this Government.

Mr. FOSTER. If he did not hear from them for four months longer he would be better off.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Connecticut thinks that if he did not hear from the Government for four months longer he would be better off; but how do we know that? Does not every man believe that if, during the last six months we had had daily communication with our army, it would have been of great service to the country? I have no doubt of that; I do not think the Senator from Maine has.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How would it have been of service?

Mr. WILSON. How? You would have been in communication with your army; you could have learned its precise daily condition; its actual wants; and the Department here could have governed itself by an exact knowledge of the condition of the army. Would not that have been of advantage to the country?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator be a little more definite? I ask, what has been lost by not having that precise information?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot tell what has been lost. The Senator does not know what has been lost; I do not know. Perhaps three million dollars have been lost. No man in the country can possibly tell how much we have lost. No man can estimate fully what we should have gained if we had had this communication. Secretary Marcy said that if we had had a telegraphic line to the South, in connection with Mexico, during the Mexican war, one telegraphic dispatch would have saved this country $500,000. We know that when the armies of France, of England, and of Russia were assembled at Sebastopol, their Governments built lines of telegraph to connect them with the army, and one of them laid down four thousand miles of telegraph in Russia, to connect the Government and the army, and no doubt millions of dollars were saved by the connection. The Governments engaged in that great contest deemed connection with their armies so important that in time of war, notwithstanding all their great expenditures to carry on the war, they constructed thousands of miles of telegraph, to put their Governments and the world in communication with their armies. Who doubts that they gained by it, and gained immensely? They were able, by means of the telegraph, to put themselves in communication with their army, and to have all the advantages of a continual daily knowledge of the wants and conditions of the army. So it would be here. It is hard to tell how much we have gained by the telegraphs of the country, and how much we should have lost if they had not existed; but we all know that in every department they have been of infinite service to the country. I believe a telegraphic communication with the army in Utah will be of great service. If it had existed there a few months ago, I think it would have been worth all that it will cost; and if the troubles exist there five, six, or twelve months longer, the country will save money by the erection of a telegraphic communication with the army. We can only estimate these advantages by our knowledge of what has been done in other cases. We might save a great deal by this communication, or we might perhaps not make any great gains by it. That we cannot tell with certainty. We have only to judge of probabilities. The Senator from Maine thinks it will be of no service; I think it will be of great service. We differ. I vote for the bill; he votes against it.

Now, sir, in regard to the cost: the matter is put in the hands of the Secretary of War. The Senator from Maine has not great confidence in the Secretary of War. I do not know that any of us have much reason to have great confidence in him. He has unquestionably brought into that Department less of experience than some other men in the country could have done, less experience than his predecessor, certainly; but this bill puts it in his hands. It empowers him to make just such contract as he deems for the interest of the country. The limitation is, that it shall not exceed half a million dollars. He can make such a contract as he shall find most advantageous to the Government, after consulting the men in the country who desire to lay down these works. I take it there are several companies perfectly willing to do it. I have had several letters on the subject since this bill was reported, from men who are ready to come here and to go into a contest to secure the laying down of this line. I take it the Secretary of War, if he looks to the interests of the country, if this bill should pass will make as good a contract as he can make, as cheap a one as he can. He certainly ought to do so in the present condition of the Treasury. It places the matter in his hands with this limitation, that the erection of a line from the borders of Iowa or Missouri to Salt Lake, a distance of about twelve hundred miles, shall not exceed half a million dollars, or if he builds it any portion of that distance, say to Fort Laramie, six hundred and forty miles, it shall only be in that proportion.

I shall vote for this bill. I know that it is one of those propositions that no man can tell their certain advantages to the country. We do not any of us know how long the Mormon difficulties will continue. Should they continue for six or twelve months, I take it there is not a man in the Senate or the country who doubts that a telegraphic communication would be of great service to the army and to the country; for it would present to us the daily condition and wants of the army, which it now takes days and weeks to give us.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I should not rise now to say a word in regard to this bill if I were not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, from which it has been reported. I was very much opposed to the measure in committee. It excited but very little discussion there, and it is brought before the Senate without any very strong impressions on its behalf in the committee. I believe the agreement of the committee was, that the bill should be reported for the action of the Senate. The committee were equally divided in opinion upon it, but assented that it might be brought before the Senate, so that this body should determine the question. That is the only authority with which it comes before the Senate. It proposes to appropriate $500,000 for the making of a contract that I think, according to the language of the bill, has no limit. I have never known such power proposed to be given to any one man as the language of the bill we are now asked to pass will give. I will read one or two clauses, and then leave to the reflections of the Senate to say what it does mean, and how far it will go. The substitute presented by the Senator from Massachusetts is more carefully guarded and better prepared than the original bill, but I believe what may be said of the one may be verily said of the other. The substitute provides:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the extension and use of an electric telegraph, from the frontiers of Missouri or Iowa, to such military posts as he may deem necessary for the public service."

I suppose we should conclude, and the Secretary, in carrying out a provision of this kind, would also conclude, that there should be but one telegraph line established; yet I do not see that that is plainly declared here, but there is no limit to which, under the terms of this clause, he may not go. He may stop at the first military post to which the line goes, at the distance of ten miles, or he may go on one hundred miles and stop there; or he may go to the Salt Lake and stop there. He is to commence the line anywhere upon the borders of Missouri or Iowa, at his discretion, according to the representations that may be made to him, I presume by interested parties, and probably by the same parties who now ask that this appropriation shall be made, and this business consigned to their care.

The line is to extend from the frontiers of Missouri or Iowa "to such military posts as he may deem necessary for the public service." There are a great many military posts in every direction. It does not say that, when he has commenced to run the line westward, he shall continue to run westward, but he may diverge in any direction. It goes on to say:

"The said contract to provide for the management and working of the said telegraph by private enterprise after the necessity for the means of communication with the army in Utah shall have ceased."

When he makes a contract for the construction of the telegraph, he is to provide in the terms of that contract, at a time when he will have had no practical experience on the subject, when this experiment will not have been tested, when the only information he can receive will be from those interested in the matter in some way, for allowing them to do what they please with the line after the necessity for its use for the connection with the army in Utah shall have ceased. This is a provision to be made at once by the Secretary, who, I presume, is not better able to judge on this subject than most men who reside in the eastern States, and who know little or nothing of the wilds of the West. I suppose, under the authority contained in this clause, he may give away the line to have it worked by private enterprise, or he may do what has been done by Congress in regard to the Memphis navy-yard—after spending a large sum of money on a public work, give it away; and the men who receive pay for constructing it may take it afterwards, and charge what they please; or he may do what is worse, make arrangements by which the Government shall continue to be the owner of it, and pay these parties for any length of time, or annually, a fixed sum for its use; and there is no limit upon the amount.

This is the unlimited character of the powers which this bill proposes to give; and on reading it, I do not see how there is any escape from the conclusion that these powers were unquestionably confided to the Secretary of War. The object is to facilitate the operations of the army in Utah. We are anxious to help the Administration to get communications to and from Utah, on account of the war, but we are scarcely willing to give them a single regiment of troops to carry on the war. This strikes me as a strange course of proceeding. The bill goes further, and provides that the "telegraph shall not cost more than $500,000 to Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah." It does not say that the Secretary shall run it so far; it does not say, that when he has got there he shall stop; but there is full power for him to go as far west, or in any other direction, as he may choose to go. He may carry it to the military posts which we have on the borders of the Pacific, and there is nothing to arrest him. The only limitation is, that it shall not cost more than $500,000 to get to Utah. This power is not given to the present Secretary of War merely, but to any one who may occupy that Department. What is to prevent him from giving a million of dollars more, to construct a telegraphic line to San Francisco? I should not be surprised if the delegation from California were in favor of this bill.

Mr. GWIN. They are; or, at least, I am, as one of them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. They ought to be in favor of it; and if I were a representative of the State of California, as the honorable Senator is, I should be in favor of it; because this bill, it seems to me, grants the power to extend it to the Pacific. I have no idea that the present Secretary of War would, under this bill, give to this line that extension, but the power is contained in the loose terms of the proposition which we are now called on to pass. There are a great many objections to it, but as I really do not believe that the Senate has any serious notion of passing this bill, I will not consume time further in debating it.

Mr. BRODERICK. It is very evident, Mr. President, from the debate on this bill, that it will not receive many votes in the Senate; but that consideration shall not determine my course in regard to it. The Senator from Massachusetts has presented this case, I think, very well to the Senate; and I was somewhat surprised to hear the Senator from Georgia attack the proposition in the manner he did. Now, sir, the Senator from Arkansas has told the Senate that the Secretary of War can extend this line to the Pacific. That is what I want him to do. I vote for this bill, because it is to construct a telegraph half the way to California.

But, sir, I am surprised to hear Senators object to the amount of money proposed to be appropriated for the construction of this line of telegraph, when there are men about the hotels of Washington city boasting that they have made contracts with the Government, out of which they will realize a million and a half of dollars. And for what? To fight the Mormons.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that a large majority of the Senate consider this appropriation a wild and extravagant one, and that no good will ever result to the country from it. Why, sir, this Government last year made a large appropriation to construct a telegraphic line between the United States and Europe, and a vessel of war left here but a very few months since for the purpose of laying down the telegraphic wire between Newfoundland and the coast of Ireland. Now, sir, California is a very important part of this Union. It may not be considered very important now, but I think it will be in a very few years, because the people of California are not disposed to remain quiet from year to year, begging at Congress to give them a telegraphic or railway communication with their brethren of the Atlantic slope. I shall vote for this bill as a step in that direction. I think it appropriates a very small amount of money for such a great purpose. It is but $500,000, and the Secretary of War will have power to make a contract for $100,000 or $150,000, if he can find any one who will undertake to lay a telegraphic wire between our western frontier and Utah for that sum. I hope we shall have the year and years on this bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, this proposition to establish a telegraphic communication with Utah I believe is not questioned upon the ground of its constitutionality. It may be defended either as a war measure or as a postal measure. It is objected that the war with Utah is not to last for any length of time, and if the telegraph should be established it would be of no use to the Government. For myself, sir, for one, I do not as yet admit that a war actually exists between the Government of the United States and the Mormons; I hope that no such war will really be begun in earnest; but if such a war is begun, from all the knowledge I have of the character of that people, it will be no war of months—it will be a war of years before it is ended. I have hoped, therefore, that the time would not come when there would be an actual collision of arms between the troops of the United States and that most extraordinary people denominated the Mormons. From their position, their numbers, their character, their warlike disposition, their fanaticism, their declared war against our institutions, and against all the people of the earth whom they denominate Gentiles, if the war is to begin it will be no child's play. They are surrounded by fortifications such as no human ingenuity ever yet has devised, surrounded by those mountains which are almost impassable; and the war, if it is to go on, will be a war which will cost us much more than the war with Billy Bowlegs and his companions in the swamps of Florida.

But, sir, if such a thing is to exist, if this Government is to act upon the ground that war is to be carried on with Utah, in my opinion, in carrying on the war with Utah, nothing can be more economical, or save more money or more lives to the Government of the United States, than the establishment of the speediest and most instantaneous communication between the seat of Government and the seat of war. It may be that the bill which has been introduced here is defective in many respects. It may be that it is not definite enough; that it is not so specific in relation to the cost of this telegraph line as it ought to be. It may be that sufficient estimates have not been made to show how cheaply this line may be constructed, to satisfy the Senate to vote for the appropriation at the present time. But, sir, if this could be laid over, or sent to a committee, if it could be examined and investigated, and careful estimates made, in my opinion it would be found, that if we are to have a war with the Mormons, this telegraph line will be one of the cheapest and most economical of all the instruments that can be used in carrying on the war.

Gentlemen inquire of what use is a telegraph line in the management of armies, and in carrying on a warfare? Sir, is it not a fact, that the war before Sebastopol, which, perhaps, goes beyond anything in this age, was actually carried on and the movements of the troops directed by magnetic telegraphs extending from the seat of operations to the seat of Government, in France and in Russia? How many lives and how much money may have been saved by means of these instantaneous communications, it is not possible to tell.

But, sir, let me suppose a case. Here is your army in Utah, weeks, almost months from communication with the seat of Government. An operation is going on which requires additional troops. How can the Government know it? An operation may be carried on by which, perhaps, the war may come to an end. How can the Government know that? They may, in the mean time, start on another army, and they may contract for all the supplies to be transported over these barren plains to Utah, costing hundreds of thousand, ay, millions upon millions of dollars, and the contracts be entered into for transportation, when, if they had this instantaneous communication from the seat of war it would be wholly unnecessary.

I look upon this measure not only as one which may be very beneficial if this war is actually to be prosecuted, but as a postal measure, or as a means of communication from one side of the continent to the other. I believe that it would pay the actual expenses. I know that the fears which have been expressed and entertained by many that our country was at some time to be divided and dissolved, have been based on the idea of our very great territorial expansion; that we were in danger of falling to pieces in consequence of the very size of our empire and our territory. But, sir, my hope has been based, and my faith is fixed upon this, that the construction of railroads, the use of steam communication in every form, and above all that wonder of modern wonders, the lightning-speaking telegraph, which makes instant communication between the most distant parts of our Confederacy, is binding us together, and making neighbors of Boston and New Orleans, New York and San Francisco; and although our empire is expanded from ocean to ocean, and may still expand until it covers the whole North American continent, yet if we make use of the means which are placed in our hands of railroads and steam communications and telegraphs, we may be actually nearer together than were our fathers in the days of the Revolution. For one, I do not believe that it is wisdom on our part to deny to the Government the use of these modern and wonderful discoveries which produce that result.

Mr. President, if this bill could be laid over for a more careful investigation, for more careful estimates to be made of the actual expense which is necessary to be incurred to establish this telegraphic line to Utah, thus far on the way towards California, I still believe, notwithstanding the adverse opinions I have heard expressed here, that a majority of the Senate might be disposed to pass a bill appropriating the sum actually necessary for that purpose. If this sum, as stated by the honorable Senator from Georgia, is ten times as much as it ought to be, or as is necessary to construct the line, let the sum be reduced. But, if we are to have a war with Utah and the people of Utah, let us have the means of instantaneous communication, as far as is practicable, with the army there in its operations; and, in my opinion, though the telegraphic line should cost us a large sum of money—perhaps a quarter of a million—in the end, when we come to carry on this war, and prosecute it to a termination, it will be an economy in the saving of money, of time, and of men.

Mr. HALE. I did not suppose that I should ever get out of patience with the Senate, but I confess this Utah war comes very nearly doing it. I thought it had answered its purpose when we had got the additional volunteers; I thought the Utah war had answered what was expected of it, and we should not hear of it again; but it has got here now to help this telegraph along. I have denied always, and I deny now, that there is any Utah war, or any prospect of it. There has not been a drop of blood shed. Brigham Young has been making proclamations and marrying wives—that is the whole of it. There is no more resistance now than there was years ago; no more war with Utah than there is with New Hampshire, and no danger of it. If there is any danger of it, I think I know a schoolmistress to whom I used to go to school when I was a boy, who had better be sent there, and she could quell the insurrection by peaceable agencies, and do everything required better than your Army.

I beg gentlemen to confine themselves to facts, and not go into the region of fancy, talking about this Utah war. It has no existence, never had, never will have. You cannot talk a war up here. The Administration, when the Army bill was up, kept insisting that they did not want a reinforcement for Utah, and we kept insisting that they did. Everybody that spoke was speaking about an emergency that he was going to give troops for, and the Administration was saying there was no emergency, and they did not want them, but we insisted that there was an emergency, and that they should have them. Well, sir, they got them. The emergency answered the purpose; and now Brigham Young is coming in to be another scarecrow to build this telegraph, and Heaven only knows what next. I think there is a bill—I do not know that there is a bill, but there is a proposition to vote twelve additional sloop-of-war, and I will bet you that Brigham Young will be tacked on to that. [Laughter.] We shall be told of the extraordinary emergencies of this Utah war and this rebellion of Brigham Young, by which there is a necessity for additional sloops, with which to storm Salt Lake, or something of that sort. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. Will my friend from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. He brought in a resolution himself a few days ago providing for putting full steam power into the ship Franklin. That is his own proposition to increase the Navy. Perhaps the Utah war may be tacked on to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I am obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; but he is not exactly accurate. I simply introduced a resolution of inquiry asking for information. I have not introduced a resolution proposing to do what the Senator from Florida suggests, but I hope to have his aid in favor of doing it; and I will tell you why: the ship Franklin, to which he has made allusion, is pronounced by officers of all grades from every section who have seen her, to be the finest model of a ship of war in the world. The men who have built, and who have been instrumental in building this fine model, think that, as the Government has been to such enormous expense in building the finest ship in the world, she had better be floated than be rotting under cover in the dock. So much for the ship Franklin; and I hope to have the aid of the Senator when that comes up. But, sir, that is wide of my present purpose.

I differ with great reluctance from gentlemen for whom I have so much respect as I have for my friends from Massachusetts and Wisconsin. I defer to their superior judgment; I defer to the military reputation of the distinguished general from Massachusetts; but, sir, I pretend to know as much about Mormonism as he does, [laughter,] and I do not believe there is any sort of necessity for lugging Brigham Young in here. If it is to be continued, I shall ask for an amendment to the rules of the Senate, providing that the name of Brigham Young shall not be brought into every measure, but that it shall be limited to a certain number of days, or a certain number of measures. [Laughter.]

To be serious, sir, there is no earthly use, there can be none, for this as a war measure. We have got no war, as I have said, and we shall have none; and besides, if we had, I concur in the interrogatory proposed by the Senator from Maine, what good is it going to do?

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him for a single moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator has just asserted that we have no war with Utah or with the Mormons. The bill which passed both Houses of Congress—I do not know whether the Senator voted for it or not—authorizing the President to receive into the service three regiments of volunteers, does in express terms recognize that there is war in Utah.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; and I was finding fault with that very bill for containing that very—no matter what. That is what I said, that we insisted in urging upon the Administration that there was an emergency, and that they wanted troops for the emergency, when there was no such thing in existence. It is not the first time that an act of Congress has undertaken to create a fact. I remember that there was an act of Congress which declared that war existed by the act of Mexico; but did anybody on earth believe it? No, sir. But the next session after the act was passed, Mr. Polk, President of the United States, tried to make himself believe it; and he reiterated it more than twelve times in his message, that war existed by the act of Mexico. It did not. I knew it; the country knew it; everybody knew it; nobody knew it better than Mr. Polk. The war did not exist by the act of Mexico, but, as Mr. Calhoun said on the floor of the Senate, it required an extraordinary degree of blundering on the part of the Administration to get into that war. Well, sir, extraordinary as was the degree of blundering that was necessary to get into the war with Mexico, it will require a vastly greater degree of blundering to get into a war with Utah. It will take more than one act of Congress to do it; and if Mr. Buchanan puts it into his message next December twenty-four times instead of twelve, it will not be true nevertheless.

I am opposed to this bill entirely, as a war measure. Then what good is it to do as a postal measure? Who is to regulate the other end of the wire after the war is over? We are treating these people, if there is a war, as enemies and outlaws, and yet we are establishing a telegraphic communication to their capital. I am opposed to it on every possible consideration upon which it can be urged, and on any possible argument that can be brought to favor it. As a war measure, as a postal measure, as a measure of economy, as a measure of peace, or as a measure of war, I am utterly opposed to it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will not detain the Senate, sir; but I desire to say that I am decidedly in favor of this measure, whether we are to have a war or not; but the argument, in my opinion, is conclusive in favor of it, in the event that there are to be hostilities in Utah. The Senator from New Hampshire asks who is to have the other end of the wire? I take it for granted we should have both ends of the line. The telegraph will be laid down as far as our troops are operating, and will enable us to communicate in all days and at all hours of the day, between the capital and the army. I believe it would pay for itself, if there are to be hostilities there, during one year. It would pay for itself many times over, simply as a war measure; and when peace comes it certainly will be very useful. This telegraph line will extend half way to the Pacific, and I take it for granted the other half will be supplied very soon, and give us immediate means of communication for commercial and all other purposes, with the Pacific.

I look upon it as a great and wise measure of statesmanship, whether we regard it in reference to peace or to war. I believe there will be more practical results, with a less expenditure of money, than from any other equal appropriation this Congress can make. I will not now attempt to go into debate to answer the arguments urged against the bill. I was called away from the Senate, and have not been able to hear the arguments, except the concluding remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. I wish I knew what they were. I cannot imagine the ground of objection to the passage of the bill. I had hoped it would be passed unanimously, and even without debate, as being one of those measures which commended themselves to the judgment of all men in the Senate. I will not argue it, nor occupy time. I only wish to say thus much, in order to express my hearty approval of this bill.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I concur in many of the criticisms made on this bill by the Senator from Arkansas; I think the bill needs a great deal of amendment and perfection; but I disagree to what has been said by a great majority of the Senators who have spoken on the idea that it is either an idle or a preposterous scheme. I think there are great merits in the proposition.

Now, sir, I am of opinion that you will either have a war very soon with the Mormons, or you will have the matter to end in a farce. If it is to end in a farce, what are you to do with the two regiments of volunteers and the dozen regiments of regulars you are sending there? If you had a telegraph from here to Colonel Johnston, you would know whether to send the troops or not, and if you were to have no controversy you would not send them. You would know what description of troops he needed; you would know what supplies he required; and that is wherein, if you are to have any hostilities, this instrument would be so valuable. Therefore, I have been amazed to hear a number of gentlemen ask the question what benefit it would be to us to have a telegraph from here to Colonel Johnston's camp. Why, sir, we should know what Colonel Johnston wants, and we should be able to avoid sending what he does not want, at a vast expense; and it is too commonly the fault of commissaries and quartermasters to take a vast amount of public property that is of no use, far off, to be destroyed, because they set out upon the idea that everything, perhaps, may be required, and everything must be taken.

It is the vagueness of the bill that has given me all the trouble. I say with the Senator from Arkansas, I do not know where the Secretary of War is going to take this wire. He may take it to every Indian post all over the country. If so, I am against it; but I am in favor of this telegraph being built to Fort Laramie, and as quickly as possible.

Mr. POLK. The Senator from Ohio will allow me to ask him if the bill does not limit the amount that shall be expended?

Mr. PUGH. I do not know. That point I am willing to have investigated and examined.

Mr. POLK. It does, I believe.

Several Senators. It is limited to $500,000.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The limitation is only that it shall not exceed $500,000 to Salt Lake City. It does not say that it shall stop there. He may go westward, and lay a submarine telegraph to China, under the powers granted by this measure.

Mr. PUGH. It came with very good grace, I admit, from my friend from Arkansas to oppose this bill; but, when I heard the Senator from Maine, I was lost in astonishment. Did we not have the submarine telegraph bill here the last session? That was a proposition to lay down three thousand miles of telegraph from here to Europe; and what for? We had no soldiers at the other end of it. On what pretext was that scheme of plunder put through Congress? That once in five years we might want to send a dispatch to some foreign minister! Like the boy who put salt on his plate, so that he might be ready if anybody asked him to eat an egg, [laughter,] we laid down a telegraphic wire lest we might have occasion to send a dispatch; and we were to pay so much a year for twenty-five years irrevocably. The Senator from Maine could see no constitutional difficulty, no objection to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any constitutional difficulty in this.

Mr. PUGH. Well, he could see no financial difficulty. It was voted. It came from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, as if we were going to have post offices and post roads under water from here to Europe. It passed, and we have sent out our ships. We have been at it a year or two, until they broke the wire.

Now, sir, as to a telegraphic communication to the Pacific, if it can be made, and made in the cheapest manner possible, I am in favor of it. I do not want to pay for all of it, but I am willing to pay for a reasonable share. I am willing to pay for whatever will be valuable to us for communicating intelligence in time of war. Therefore, my object in rising is to say there is ten hundred times more merit in this proposition than there was in the submarine telegraph bill which was carried triumphantly through both Houses; but I am in favor of its being committed or laid over to amend it, so that while we shall not assume the whole responsibility of this work, we may offer some fair advantages to persons who will consent to make it all the way to California, or part of the way, and that we shall give them, so far as it traverses the territories of the United States, the right of way and a reasonable sum for the use of it, so long as we may require it. I hope the bill will lie over, for I am very much afraid that if it comes to a vote now it will be defeated and we shall get no benefit from it; and as the Committee on Military Affairs is equally divided, I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that he let the bill lie over.

Mr. WILSON. I propose, Mr. President, to let the bill go over for several days for these reasons: In the first place, I want the bill made as perfect as man can make it. I am willing that any limitations shall be placed upon it that the ingenuity of man can put upon it to protect the Government. In the next place, as we have been called upon for estimates, I think that within a few days we can ascertain all the facts bearing upon the case. I would like to have the question go over, and I make the motion that it be postponed for a week from this day, at one o'clock.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senate will not postpone this bill. It has been upon the table now for a week or ten days, and the Senator from Massachusetts has been trying to get the floor every day for the purpose of taking it up. If this bill can be perfected, let it be perfected now. It gives the power, I understand, to the Secretary of War to construct a telegraphic communication between the Missouri river and Salt Lake. If any Senator has any objection to giving the power to the Secretary of War, let it be given to the President of the United States, or to any other member of the Cabinet. The appropriation is limited to $500,000; it cannot exceed that sum one dollar; I see no necessity, therefore, for referring this bill to any committee. If the Senate is disposed to vote it down, let the vote be taken at once; if Senators are disposed to pass the bill, they can signify it by their votes.

Mr. MALLORY. Before the vote is taken, I desire to ask the Senator who reported this bill if he can inform me what time it will take to execute the contract for this telegraph, at least to the post now occupied by Colonel Johnston?

Mr. WILSON. The parties who petition for this line say they can build it from Fort Leavenworth, or any point on the Missouri river, to connect with Colonel Johnston's camp, which is one thousand and fifty miles, in one hundred days. I think a bargain can be made with them, and they can redeem the pledge, that they will make this connection in one hundred days. I wish to say, while I am up, that, as there is objection to the form of the bill, I think the Senator from California had better agree to let the matter go over, say until Thursday, at one o'clock. Give us time to put the bill in shape, and to ascertain some facts more than we have got now in regard to it, and I do not despair of carrying it.

Mr. IVERSON. I am opposed to this bill, in any shape in which it can be presented. I do not believe it can be presented with any guards in which it would meet my approbation, and I think that is the temper and opinion of the Senate. In order to obviate any further consumption of time, I think it proper the Senate should have a test vote on the question, and, if I am in order, I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the first Monday of next December. If that motion prevail, the Senate is opposed to the bill; and if not, it can be postponed for a few days.

Mr. BRODERICK and Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope, Mr. President, we shall not agree to this motion. If the proposition is to be voted down, let us do it directly. I do not approve of this left-handed way of disposing of questions. Those in favor of the measure had better meet it fairly and squarely.

Mr. IVERSON. I put it as a test question.

Mr. CAMERON. I think that is not the better way of getting at it. Let us have the question before us at once. To my mind it seems that this proposition is a good one for the country.

The gentlemen on the opposite side tell us there is a war in Utah. If so, in my opinion, it is a blundering war; and I think it was a mistake to make that war, and I believe it will result in disgrace to the country; but if the war is to be carried on, let us give to the Government every facility for carrying it on properly and efficiently. Nothing can add more to the efficiency of the progress of this war than a telegraphic line, which will give us daily communication with the army, and by means of which we can know every day what supplies and reinforcements are necessary for the purpose of maintaining and preserving that army. Only the other day the deficiency bill was passed in the other House appropriating in one item $5,400,000 for supplies already contracted for this war. That is a very formidable sum, Mr. President, which is calculated to give the impression that there either is, or is soon to be, a war. If there is to be a war, it seems to me the Government should have this telegraphic line.

In addition to that, as has been very wisely said, when we get the telegraphic communication to Utah, more than half the distance between the Atlantic and the Pacific will be overcome. Everybody who is desirous of keeping California and the Pacific slope as a portion of the Union, ought to be anxious to make some communication with that distant country—that valuable portion of our Union—which will add to the desire of the people there to remain a part of us.

It seems to me there is every reason why we ought to vote for this bill; and if it is to be disposed of at once, I am desirous, at all events, of seeing those who are willing to vote for it directly, and those who are disposed to vote against it directly.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bright, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hammon, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, and Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Douglas, Harlan, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—17.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. SLIDELL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 13, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Hon. SAMUEL CARUTHERS, a member from the seventh congressional district of the State of Missouri, appeared and qualified, by taking the oath to support the Constitution.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had, on the 7th instant, approved and signed a bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States two additional regiments of volunteers; and also a message in writing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate have passed the following bills; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 162) for the relief of John L. Allen and Asa R. Carter;

An act (S. No. 208) for the relief of Fabius Stanley;

An act (S. No. 248) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Luther Jewett, late collector of the district of Portland and Falmouth, in the State of Maine; and

An act (S. No. 248) to amend or define the act of July 29, 1850, entitled "An act providing for recording the conveyances of vessels, and for other purposes."

Also, that the Senate insist upon their disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the same; and that Mr. GREEN, Mr. HUNTER, and Mr. SEWARD be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to give notice that, at one o'clock to-morrow, I shall ask the House to take up and dispose of the bill for the admission of Kansas.

WASHINGTON AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having made House bill No. 478, to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject, and having subsequently also made Senate bill No. 232, for the same purpose, a special order from day to day till disposed of, after a certain other bill was disposed of, these two bills are now before the committee.

Mr. GOODE. The Senate bill having passed the ordeal of that body, and the matter having been maturely considered by the Senate—the provisions of the House bill disapproved by them having been stricken out, and others, which have met their favorable consideration, having been inserted—it appears to me that it would be a saving of time to take up the Senate bill. I therefore propose that course.

Mr. LEITER. I object, and propose to take up the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a question to be decided by the committee.

Tellers were called for and ordered; and Messrs. J. GLANCY JONES and NICHOLS were appointed. The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 56.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate bill was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be established an auxiliary guard, or watch, for the protection of persons and property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,000, one captain at an annual salary of $1,200, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly. To serve during the night, and in the day time when specially ordered to do so. The chief of the auxiliary guard shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the captains, lieutenants, and men shall be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size; and the said chief is also authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of the said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers of Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This section to take effect so soon as the chief shall report to the Secretary of the Interior that he has thirty men enrolled and ready for duty.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed $75,000, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by Mr. DOB, was then read, as follows: A bill to establish an efficient police for the city of Washington.

That the boards of the city council of the city of Washington shall forthwith appoint commissioners of election, according to the charter of said city, who shall, on four days' notice after the passage of this act, hold an election for the choice of four commissioners of police, in manner following: At such election each voter of the city of Washington shall vote for two persons for commissioners of police, and no ballot shall be counted that contains more than two names; and the four persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected, and two of them shall hold their offices for two years, and two of them for one year from the day of said election; and the person having the greatest and the person having the lowest number of votes shall be the two to go out of office at the end of one year; and if any two have the same and the highest or the lowest number of votes, such two shall draw lots between themselves to determine which shall go out of office; and there shall be an election on the same day every succeeding year, held as above directed, for two commissioners of police, at which each voter shall vote for one person only, and no ballot shall be counted that contains more than one name; and the two persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected, and shall hold their office for two years from the day of their election; and the said four commissioners of police shall constitute a board, to any act or resolution whereof the assent of three of said board, entered on its minutes in writing, shall be necessary; and said board is hereby invested with power to appoint and remove, at their pleasure, the police force hereinafter provided for, and also to appoint and remove, at their pleasure, such police force as now exists under the authority of the boards of the city council, or may be hereafter established; and the said board shall make rules and regulations for the government of all the said police authorized by this act or by the said boards of the said city councils.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be established a police force for the protection of public and private property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief, at an annual salary of $2,000; one captain, at an annual salary of $1,200; four lieutenants, at an annual salary of $800 each; and one hundred men, at an annual salary of $600 each; to be paid monthly.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size; and the chief is authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the commissioners aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to each commissioner chosen and serving under this act, an annual salary of $1,000.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the commissioners of police, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That each member of the police force, before entering upon the discharge of his duty, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully and impartially discharge his duties as such.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. LEITER. I ask permission, now, to offer a substitute for the bill.

Mr. GOODE. After I make the motion which I propose to do, I will yield. I propose to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting as follows:

That there be established an auxiliary guard or watch for the protection of public and private property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,500, one captain at an annual salary of $1,400, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $1,000 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $800 each, to be paid monthly, to serve during the night, and in the daytime when specially ordered so to do. The chief of the auxiliary guard shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the captain and lieutenants shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary. The men shall be appointed by the chief of the guard.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size, and the said chief is also authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, and to prescribe such arms for the use of the guard as they may deem necessary, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed. The chief of the guard shall be invested with the penal jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and required to hold a court daily for the investigation of causes and the trial of misdemeanors and petty offenses, to be decided according to the laws of the District of Columbia. But in no case shall he inflict punishment greater than a fine of $20, or confinement in a jail, work-house, or house of correction, for a term not exceeding twenty days.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This section to take effect so soon as the chief shall report to the Secretary of the Interior that he has thirty men enrolled and ready for duty.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed $75,000, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. Chairman, all of that bill is identical with the Senate bill, with a few exceptions. It appropriates $5,000 where the Senate bill appropriates $10,000, as secret service money. It also contains an additional clause investing the chief of the guard with the penal jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. The Senate bill proposes to give to the chief a salary of $2,000. I propose to give him a salary of $2,500. The Senate bill proposes to give to the captain a salary of $1,200. I propose to give to the captain a salary of $1,400. The Senate bill proposes to give to the lieutenants a salary of $800 each. I propose to give to the lieutenants a salary of $1,000 each. These modifications will increase the cost of the bill some fifteen hundred dollars, which is, I think, an inconsiderable amount, when we consider the effect which may be produced on the character of the officers to be employed. I am asked why a salary of $2,500 will command the services of a better officer than a salary of $2,000? Well, I might reply that I may refer that question safely to the understanding of every gentleman here present, and to his own feelings on the subject. But, sir, I was about to remark that the expenses of the bill will be diminished in the aggregate, because I have proposed to reduce the appropriation for secret service money from $10,000 to $5,000, while the increase of salaries will only amount to $1,500, so that there will be a saving of $3,500 by my bill.

There is another difference between my amendment and the Senate bill. In the clause appointing the captain and lieutenants under this bill, I provide that the captain and lieutenants shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. The Senate bill provides that they shall be appointed by the chief of the guard, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, or to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

I do not know that it is a very important modification; but it appears to me to be consistent, and more consistent, with the principles of our Constitution, which provides that it may be lawful for Congress to provide for the appointment of inferior officers by the President alone, or by the courts, or by the heads of Departments. As the Constitution constitutes the heads of Departments as an appointing power, I prefer to follow its mandate.

There is no other modification material in the bill except those to which I have adverted. It appropriates but $5,000 secret service money; whereas the Senate bill appropriates $10,000. And then the amendment which I have proposed contains a new provision, which I have sent to the Chair in manuscript. That provision proposes to establish a police court. It appears to me that one of the great wants of this city is a court of police.

Under the present provisions of law, warrants for the most petty offenses can only be tried by indictment of the grand jury. A man cannot be tried for the petty larceny of a ninepence without involving a cost to the Government of not less than forty, and perhaps one hundred dollars. And it appears to me to be eminently proper that summary justice should be visited upon those who are brought before the chief of police by the officers of the guard. It is far more effective to have offenses charged to be tried speedily, instead of waiting and allowing the negligence of witnesses to postpone the day of retribution for months. I deem it important that that provision should be adopted; and that a court should be instituted to try summarily petty offenses which do not rise to the dignity of crime.

Mr. Chairman, these are the modifications which I propose to the Senate bill. I will briefly state what are the provisions of that bill. Although it has been printed, and in the hands of the various members of the House for some days, it is very possible that many have not seen it until to-day.

The Senate bill provides, in its first section, for the organization of a police force, to consist of a chief, a captain, four lieutenants, and one hundred men. The salary of the chief is fixed at $2,000; the salary of the captain at $1,200; that of the lieutenants at $800 each; and that of the men at $600 each.

The bill provides that the chief of police shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. That appears to me to be entirely consonant with the principles of the Constitution. The Chief Magistrate of the Government is, by the policy of the founders of our system of government, the great appointing power; and we are only authorized to depart from it in the appointment of Federal officers by vesting such appointment in the courts or in the heads of Departments. And it is on the departure from this great fundamental principle of the Constitution that I place my principal opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DOBB,] my colleague on the Committee for the District of Columbia. I deem that to take from the President the appointment of these officers, and to place it where the proposition of the gentleman from New York places it, is an infraction of the principles of the Federal Constitution; for, under that Constitution, if the appointment be taken from the President, it can only be vested in the courts or in the heads of the Departments, unless it is held that these are municipal officers of the District of Columbia; in which case the appointment cannot be vested in such a tribunal, as is indicated by the gentleman from New York.

But, sir, while I base my principal opposition to the proposition of my friend from New York, on the fact that it violates a principle of the Federal Constitution, yet, as an effective provision, it appears to me eminently calculated to destroy the whole efficiency of the police force. He proposes to appoint four commissioners, two of which he intends shall be elected by the Democratic party, and two by the American party. Thus, if he succeeds in adopting the scheme which he has devised, we shall have a police force composed of antagonistic elements, arrayed against each other in equal force. How is it possible that controversies arising in such a board shall be settled?—two Democrats and two Americans to settle questions upon which they are diametrically opposed to each other!

I cannot conceive of an argument between them upon any question in which party feeling is involved. The gentleman and myself might find it impossible to compromise upon such questions, and so with them. In the case of a police force, we want unity of will, concert, and energy of action. But according to the scheme of the gentleman from New York, all unity of will is prevented, and all concert of action is destroyed. It is a violation, then, in my opinion, of the principles of the Constitution, is a complete destruction of all efficiency in respect to the force itself. For those reasons I hope it will be defeated.

In all its other provisions except that providing for a board of commissioners, it is identical with the Senate bill, and with the bill I have presented. The other provisions are merely of detail. The second section provides for the establishment of a guard-house, and divides the guard into squads of a convenient size for patrolling the city. The third section provides for the formation of a board to establish rules and regulations for the government of the police. I believe that a similar provision is in all the three propositions which are before the House. This section provides that the Mayor of the city of Washington, the district attorney of the District of Columbia, the marshal of the District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, shall be invested with power to make such regulations as may be deemed necessary to the government of that corps. All the propositions have the same provision, and therefore it is not necessary longer to dwell upon it.

The fourth section of the Senate bill appropriates $10,000 for the purpose of bringing to justice offenders against the law, those whose malfeasance compels Congress to bring this corps of police into existence. The amendment of the gentleman from New York, as well as my amendment, contemplates an appropriation of only $5,000, which I hope will be enough.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. My colleague has spoken of a secret-service fund. I see nothing of this kind in the bill, and I would like an explanation of the matter.

Mr. GOODE. The money proposed to be appropriated is to enable the officers of the police to detect criminals, to bring witnesses from abroad, and to institute such proceedings as may be necessary to bring offenders to justice. That is all.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I understand it to be only an ordinary contingent fund.

Mr. GOODE. Certainly it is; and if I used any term in reference to it, to which odium attaches, it is my fault.

The fifth section provides for a uniform dress for the members of the police—a matter which I suppose is unnecessary to comment upon.

The sixth section repeals all acts which have heretofore been passed relating to the employment of an auxiliary guard, and prescribes the time when this act shall go into effect.

The seventh section appropriates $75,000, with which to pay the police and to defray contingent expenses. The sum of $66,400 will be required for the payment of salaries under the Senate bill; under the amendment I have offered, $68,000 will be required for the same purpose. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will require $4,000 more than the Senate bill, making $70,400. While the bill of the Senate appropriates $10,000 for contingent expenses, the two amendments before the House propose to appropriate only $5,000 for the same purpose.

It is not my object to inflame the House by any statement in connection with the necessity for this bill. The circumstances of the times have impressed the minds of members with the necessity of an effective police. To have an effective police the action of Congress is indispensable; and, in my opinion, the action of Congress could not be beneficially exerted in any other way than by the passage of the amendment I have presented. I therefore hope it will be adopted by the House, and that the substitute of the gentleman from New York will be voted down.

Mr. COMINS. It is well the subject now before us is being considered in Committee of the Whole, where not only the merits of the Senate bill, but the causes which have made it seemingly incumbent upon Congress to act in the matter, may be discussed. Although I do not desire to pursue this investigation minutely myself, I trust there are those who will faithfully expose the state of things which exists, and which will continue to exist until a dynasty which at present rules this country is overthrown. It is in vain to remodel municipal laws, or to make new ones, so long as the basis upon which they rest is rotten. The state of things which exists in this city to-day is the legitimate fruit of the tree. It is the fruit of an institution popularized on the political stump, and elaborated on the judicial bench.

It is alleged that infamous crimes are daily and nightly committed against persons and property in this District! Is this anything new? Listen to the voices of the murdered Keating, and Hume, and a score of others. Were not the murderers and assassins arrested? Has justice in this District been at fault through the remissness of the police or the tribunal? Have we not seen the principles of justice and of law trampled in the dust and set at naught by the criminal court, (Judge Crawford,) and the result applauded by eminent Senators and distinguished Representatives? Mr. Chairman, there is little use in attempting a reformation at one end of the government of this District, without a corresponding change at the other.

I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to it because it is wrong in principle, anti-Democratic, in conflict with the principles of republican liberty, and a subversion of the principle of popular sovereignty. It is anti-republican, because it places the people of this District under laws and regulations for the government of the city, in which they have no voice.

The third section of the bill is as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of the said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

This one section of the bill confers as much power upon four commissioners as is conferred by any city charter in the United States upon a city government, so far as government of police and police laws are concerned. And who are these commissioners to be; who is the district attorney who is to make laws for the government of every man, woman and child in this city? Who is the marshal of the District, and who is to be the chief of this precious auxiliary guard? Sir, they are to be the partisan appointees of a partisan President. What security have we that they will not be the men, or of the men, who have stricken down in cold blood our brothers in a distant Territory? I rejoice that that Territory is about to be relieved of their presence, but I do not wish them installed by the same Executive hand to govern and riot here in our midst.

This bill is a subversion of the principles of popular sovereignty, because it denies the right of the people to govern themselves. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to place so low an estimation upon the moral condition of the seventy thousand inhabitants of this city as to believe them incapable of self-government. Shall we proclaim it to the world that the moral authority of the human mind is no longer an element in the government in the capital of free America? No vote of mine shall inaugurate a despotism like that contemplated in this bill.

I have had sufficient experience in municipal government to know that there is nothing the people so much hate as a foreign police. Put a guard of one, two, or three hundred men, appointed by the President, to patrol any city in New England, and the boys would drive them from the streets in an hour.

I acknowledge there is a bad state of affairs in this city—a state of affairs which exists partly from the failure of Congress to do its duty; and partly, but mainly, from the failure of the people of the City and county of Washington to do their duty. Congress has failed to do its duty in not reforming the suffrage laws of this District. The people of the District failed to do their duty when they rejected the bill passed by the Thirty-Fourth Congress, approved August 11, 1856, extending and guarantying the privileges of free schools to the entire people of this District. Have we not told you time and time again, that without a system of free schools you could expect nothing but vice and crime? As a member of the General Government, and a denizen of Washington, I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to it from principle; and I am opposed to it because I believe we shall have no better government under it than we shall without it. From what source is this new government to emanate? Sir, it is to emanate from a corrupt and repudiated Administration—an Administration that has reached that point of corruption in which purity appears ridiculous and modesty is treated with contempt; and can you expect the stream to rise higher than the fountain? Have we not spent the entire session of this Congress to rescue one people from its tyranny? and will gentlemen vote to place another people within its grasp? Sir, no vote of mine shall give additional power to the present Executive. Enlarge the liberties of the whole people of this District, instead of circumscribing them; appropriate and expend one hundred thousand dollars a year for free schools, instead of employing foreign stipendiaries to patrol the streets; make it a felony for the President, or any Government officer, to interfere in the municipal elections of this city, instead of giving them supreme power; and there will be a reform in the government that will relieve Congress from all expense or responsibility in protecting the peace and quiet of the community.

I shall vote against the bill, unless materially amended.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Chairman, I must express my surprise that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is usually so moderate and magnanimous in the views which he presents to this House, should have been, on this occasion, so far carried beyond that line of moderation which has characterized his legislative conduct, that when a bill is proposed for the purpose of giving to the people of the District, citizens as well as strangers, security in their persons and property, he rises in his place and objects to the bill, because, forsooth, it is interfering with the municipal privileges of the citizens of this District. Has the gentleman forgotten that his party, in the great State of New York, but a short year ago, departed from the principle which he has been contending for here to-day, by taking away the municipal privileges of the city of New York, and vesting the appointment of the police of that city in the legislative and executive departments of the State, at Albany?

Mr. MORGAN. What did your political friends say about it?

Mr. CLEMENS. Why, sir, my political friends were in favor of allowing the municipal privileges of the city of New York to rest where they had been for a long series of years.

Mr. COMINS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia that I have always regarded the policy in New York to which he refers as anti-Democratic, and I am not yet convinced of the expediency of the measure.

Mr. CLEMENS. Very well, then, the gentleman differs from his party. The Republican party of the State of New York took away utterly and entirely the municipal privileges of New York, and vested them in the hands of the Legislature at Albany. The appointment of the commissioners, at least, was by the law given to the Legislature.

Mr. BURROUGHS. The gentleman is mistaken. They are appointed by the Governor.

Mr. CLEMENS. How were they appointed before?

Mr. BURROUGHS. The police were appointed by the Mayor of the city.

Mr. CLEMENS. The law passed by the Republican party expressly interfered with the municipal privileges of the people of the city of New York. They are Democratic, and the powers at Albany are Republican. Where, then, is your consistency in objecting to vesting this power in the President and contending for the very same principle here which you have sanctioned by your Legislature in New York?

Sir, there can be no rational objection, in my opinion, to the passage of the bill as proposed by the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia; and I am sorry to see gentlemen on that side of the Chamber carried away so far by their prejudices against the Executive, I will not say by an unkind feeling, but by at least a mistrustful feeling towards the Administration, as to vote against a measure of public safety merely because it vests in the Executive a power so important to the people of this District. The present Executive of the Union will not be here forever. We shall have other Executives to which this power will be confided.

Mr. CURTIS. There will be a change in 1860.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman says there will be a change in 1860. Very well; suppose there be. I should like to know if he would not be very glad to give that power to his Executive?

Mr. CURTIS. Never; never.

Mr. CLEMENS. I know that gentlemen out of power are very distrustful of what is called executive patronage; but I have never yet seen any gentleman in power who was not willing to stand up to his party and his President.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to say to the gentleman here, that if he will look over the years and days of last Congress, he will find on record several instances where gentlemen separated themselves from their party. If the gentleman expects this side of the House to give to the present Executive the power of appointing the police, without regard to the general good or the various elements of party politics found in this city, he is mistaken.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. I object to the farming out of the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Virginia is farming out the floor. He yielded for explanation.

Mr. KILGORE. I would refer the gentleman to the case of a Virginia accidental President—John Tyler—who was abandoned by his party; and I think that the party with whom I have the honor to act will, under similar circumstances, be found doing the same. And the gentleman will permit me to ask him if he has not a partisan President; and if so, why it is that he voted against the deficiency bill?

Mr. CLEMENS. I am very glad that the gentleman has asked that question. I voted against the deficiency bill, and I would do it again—

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a point of order. I believe the deficiency bill is disposed of, and is not now before the committee, and so the gentleman has no right to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order. The practice of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has been—though contrary to the opinions of the present incumbent of the chair—to indulge members in talking about anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLEMENS. I voted against the deficiency bill, and I would vote against it again, and as many times as it is proposed in the House. I will vote against it just as often as it proposes to give officers sitting at the Clerk's desk $68,000 of gratuity for services for which they have been paid by law, dating back, not to the commencement of last Congress, but going back eleven years—giving your chief clerk a salary amounting to a larger sum than is given to the Clerk of the House. I voted against that because it was a masked battery—because it professed to do on its face what it had not the boldness to avow. It did not specify any amount to be drawn from the Treasury, but it vested in the Clerk of the House an arbitrary discretion to give to certain officers allowances under resolutions of Congress, which, under the phraseology of the third section, date back twelve years. Do you know—you, gentlemen, who are called upon to stand up to your party and your President—you over whom the Washington Union cracks its Russian knout—do you know how many thousands of dollars you voted in that section of the deficiency bill?

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the gentleman why he did not make this speech before the vote was taken on the bill, so that we could have voted against it?

Mr. CLEMENS. I will tell the reason. I sought the floor on three different occasions, as my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] knows, and as my colleague from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] knows; and applied to both of them, over and over again, to give me an opportunity to state my objections to the bill; and I was kept down by an objection of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN]; and, when I appealed to him personally to withdraw his objection, he refused to do so. My colleague was willing to accord to me the privilege.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to correct an item of history. I recollect, one afternoon, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when there was nobody to take the floor, the committee, consisting of about three, rose, and went into the House. If the gentleman had been there at that time, he would have had an opportunity of enlightening as many as were present. I had a notion myself to address the committee.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. The decision of the Chair, it seems to me, has permitted a latitude to this debate which was never yet taken. I believe it has been the practice to allow gentlemen to debate on all measures alive and pending, but not to allow debate on what is dead and past.

Mr. CLEMENS. If the gentleman will suspend a moment, he will save his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that he is not aware of any restriction being put on debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then a member might discuss the Panama mission.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; some things dead as long have been discussed here.

Mr. CLEMENS. I did not hear the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE]; but I have no doubt they were as humorous as usual.

Mr. FLORENCE. I said that if the gentleman had been here one of those afternoons when Kansas affairs were under discussion, he would have had an opportunity to have got the floor and spoken on the deficiency bill. But he was not present, I suppose, and there was nobody to speak, and the committee, as many as were present at the time, rose. I was about volunteering to the Chair, to keep the committee together, that if he would give me an opportunity, I would put to the end of the message of the President the words, "I concur;" and let that be my speech. If the gentleman had been here, he would have had an opportunity to speak, and I have no doubt that it would have been very gratifying to those present to have heard something else than Kansas.

Mr. CLEMENS. I come back to this bill, and to the consideration of the no-party question presented here by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMINS.] The gentleman from Ohio states that he can give a variety of instances in which men have broken loose from the fetters of party, and stood up in the independence of honorable manhood. Sir, if a gentleman has ever done that here, he is a white crow. I know no word exactly to designate the gentleman [Mr. CAMPBELL] in the political department. Whether or not he is amphibious, I do not exactly know; whether he is an American, Republican, or Democrat, I do not know. He sails so completely in the eye of the wind that you cannot tell whether he is a seventy-four gun ship, or one of those Baltimore clippers, with black sides, and which carries an exclusively African cargo. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of all the slavery of which I ever heard or read, I condemn and despise the slavery of the mind most. I would rather be the slave of the gentleman from Virginia, across the Ohio river from my native State, under his lash, hewing wood and drawing water for him, than to be the slave intellectually to his or any other party or power on earth.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman has made a declaration that sounds magnanimous. [Laughter.] It is, rhetorically, very fine.

"When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be, When the devil got well, the devil a monk was he."

Sir, the gentleman from Ohio, in proclaiming his independence of party, is clanking the shackles that bind him, for when was he anything else than a party man?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Always.

Mr. CLEMENS. Always! Why, sir, all the reputation he has in this House, and whatever reputation he may have in the country, and he has reputation in both, is derived from his allegiance to party.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. I understood the Chair to decide that it was in order to discuss any subject, dead or living; but I do not understand that it is in order to turn round and discuss the merits of an individual to his face.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see that there is any point of order in what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have only to say that so far as this no-party bill is concerned; it is of a piece with the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio that he was governed by no party allegiance. It is utterly impracticable. It could not be carried out. If we ever had in this country a no-party man, and the gentleman from Ohio is that man, I should advise him to present himself to Barnum at once.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I commenced my political career under the flag of the gallant Harry Clay. I followed that flag, with all its national inscriptions, until they were rubbed out, and the gallant hero died.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman says he followed the flag of Henry Clay as long as he could follow it, and when he could not follow anything else, he followed his shadow. He worshipped the man as long as he lived, and when he died he worshipped his grave.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir. I followed the great principles of Henry Clay, enunciated by him in 1832, as the "American system." I have followed them from that day to the present, and during the consideration of the bill now before the committee I intend to adhere to them.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman from Ohio followed the principles of Henry Clay. But what did he do when those principles ceased to be operative? Did he follow a substance or shadow? The gentleman is like a great many men out of power and seeking to regain it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am as much in power as the gentleman from Virginia. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not know whether the gentleman is as much in power as I am or not. My seat is not contested.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And mine, I believe, is in no more danger than that of the gentleman from Virginia, if justice be done.

Mr. CLEMENS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Ohio—no-party man as he says he is—belonging neither to the Democratic party, the Republican, or the American party, if he ever voted with the Democratic party?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman himself has abandoned the Democratic party. He did within the last four days, and he knows it; when I voted for the deficiency bill and he voted against it.

Mr. CLEMENS. Very well; admitting that to be true—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then you are out of the Democratic party.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to show the gentleman from Ohio how this new bill of the gentleman from New York having two commissioners of police belonging to one party and two belonging to the other—a board which is neither fish, fowl, nor good red herring; I say I desire to show how harmoniously such a board would act. They could agree upon no one proposition, and could cooperate in nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have never read the new police bill to which the gentleman refers, and perhaps do not understand its details. But I have this to say, that if he cannot trust his own Executive and his own party upon a deficiency bill which proposes to sustain the army which they have sent to the frontier to suppress rebellion, I cannot trust it with the appointment of a police for the protection of this city and District. I have taken some notice for many years past of the police regulations of this city, and I have concluded to resist an increase of Executive patronage. I should much prefer that my constituents, when they come here to the national metropolis, should come prepared to protect themselves. I will not, therefore, as their Representative, vote to give the Executive the appointment of this police force, demanded by the Senate's bill.

Mr. CLEMENS. Yet this very gentleman from Ohio, voted in favor of the deficiency bill, which gave the Executive Departments absolute control over eight or nine million dollars, and takes peculiar credit to himself for having aided in its passage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir; I beg your pardon. I claim no credit for the vote. I gave the vote to carry on the Government and to subdue alleged rebellion.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman from Ohio takes particular credit to himself forsooth. He accuses me of want of party fidelity, because I voted against the bill. Yet he voted for the bill, and is a no-party man.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It was declared by the Executive that a far off Territory was in a state of rebellion. Estimates were sent to the Committee of Ways and Means who reported a bill—and my friend from Virginia, upon my right, [Mr. LETCHER,] who had charge of the matter, sustained it ably—to supply deficiencies created by supplies to put down that rebellion. Considering the condition of the country, and taking a comprehensive view of the whole matter, without regard to parties or to sections, I did sustain the gentleman's colleague, who took charge of that bill and urged its passage. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] was not present during the discussion on the deficiency bill, I believe, or if he was present, he was silent. He spoke not. I admit that I sustained the Administration members of the Committee of Ways and Means, the gentleman from the Rockingham district, [Mr. LETCHER,] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] my colleagues upon the committee, under these circumstances. I separated myself from my party friends and from you, sir. I—

Mr. CLEMENS. You have no party. You just now said so. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Sir; you have abandoned your Administration. You have denounced and repudiated it by your vote, and are read out of its organization by its organ, and it is for you to settle your account with your own party in power; not for me to respond to your demand.

Mr. CLEMENS. Between the Washington Union and the gentleman from Ohio, the subject of this deficiency bill will be pretty well blown. I have nothing further to say upon the subject of the deficiency bill for the present.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the deficiency bill is rather a delicate subject to certain gentlemen over here. Suppose you confine your remarks to the police bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is reminded that the bill now under consideration, was made by the House a special order; and under a special order the state of the Union generally is not under consideration, and therefore debate must be confined to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to propound a question to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT.] I wish to learn at what time, and where, is the caucus of the new Democratic party to be held—including the principal portion of the old firm of HOUSTON, JONES, and LETCHER? [Great laughter.]

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Ohio belongs to a party, I believe, which claims the right to bind its members to the most solemn secrecy, and I hope he will pardon me if, on this subject, I adopt his rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman may, if he chooses, adopt the Know-Nothing rule.

Mr. CLEMENS. To come back to the consideration of the bill now before the committee. Some few months ago, Congress appointed commissioners to draft a new code of laws for the District of Columbia. That code was drawn up by the commissioners, and submitted to a vote of the people of the District. It was an efficient code, and was intended to guard life and property, and to give to the people of this District greater security than they ever had before. What was the result of that submission? That code was voted down. If there is any fault in reference to that measure, it was with the people to whom it was submitted, and who refused to adopt it by a popular vote. In regard to the bill presented to the House by my colleague from Virginia, I can see no rational objection, either to its details or to its principles; and I trust that those gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber who have heretofore professed so much interest in the people of this District, will carry this bill at once, and settle this question.

Mr. BLISS. Is it now in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Virginia is itself an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. BLISS. I supposed it would not be in order. But I will take this opportunity to indicate the amendments which I intend to offer when such action shall be had upon the pending amendment as to make them in order. I state them now, because I shall not, probably, then have an opportunity to explain their object.

I propose to insert in line five, before the word "police," the words "such of the," and after the word "Washington," in the same line, the words "as are or shall be enacted for such protection," so that that clause shall read as follows:

That there be established an auxiliary guard, or watch, for the protection of persons and property, and for the enforcement of such of the police regulations of the city of Washington as are or shall be enacted for such protection, to consist, &c.

I ask the attention of the committee to these amendments, because I offer them in good faith, as a friend of the general objects of the bill, and of the bill itself, provided it can be so modified as to meet my views.

I propose, also, to add to the end of the bill another section, as follows:

This act shall not go into effect until the city of Washington shall provide, at its own expense, a police force equal to that provided for by this bill.

I desire to say a few words as expressive of my views in relation to the obligation resting upon Congress to legislate and to pay money for the support of the city government of Washington. I do not agree in relation to this bill, or in relation to various other measures which have been before this House relating to the District of Columbia, with a large portion, if not a majority, of those upon this side of the House, and with whom I am proud to act. In that respect, and in all other respects not involving the principles of the party to which I belong, I claim the same independence of action as was claimed by my colleague, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who occupied a portion of the time of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS.]

It seems to me that the city of Washington holds a peculiar relation to the people of the United States, and that we are under obligation to do that for this city which we are not under obligation to do for any other city within the bounds of the United States, either in the States themselves or in the Territories. It was selected for the seat of Government, away from the populous portions of the country—retired, as it were, outside of the hum and bustle of business, so that all the people of all the States might come together, and act and consult for the common good of the whole. It is a sort of common neutral ground, in the good order of which the whole country is interested.

Resulting from that fact, we have here a city in which a large portion, perhaps a majority, of the people are but temporary residents. They come here because this is the seat of Government, and their business is in some way connected with it. They are here on business either for the Government, either in the employ of the Government, or on private business connected with the Government. They claim residence, some in Louisiana, some in Maine, some in Ohio, and some in the most distant portions of the Territories of the Union. They come here, then, having very little interest in the city of Washington as a locality; very little interest in the police regulations of the city, except so far as they are entitled to personal protection. Hence the population of this city is so far different from the population of any other city in the Union, that it would be unjust and improper to impose upon the property-holders the whole expense of furnishing a police, in addition to the various other expenses ordinarily appertaining to a city government.

Now, as I have said, a large proportion, and I believe a majority, of the people of this city are citizens of the various States of this Union, and they are entitled to protection while they are here engaged in their own or in the public business.

But there is another reason why we ought to do something for the protection of the people of this city. Not only are men congregated here engaged in lawful and proper business, but it is a fact—a fact, I believe, not denied by any one conversant with the state of things in this city—that the Government, I will not reflect upon parties, or upon this President or any other President, but still it is a fact that, in some way or other, the influence of this Government has congregated around this city more scoundrels and rascals that need watching by the police, than can be found in any other equal population in the United States. For that reason, also, Congress is bound to provide some measure for the protection of the honest, and for ferreting out and arresting the dishonest. But it will be seen from the amendment which I propose to offer, that I do not desire to relieve the inhabitants of the District from all the responsibility for their own government or their own protection, or from all the burdens that are incidental thereto. It has ever been my political creed to let each community, so far as it is possible, consistently with protecting the great natural rights of man, govern itself, and leave to this District and to the Territories the management of their local and private concerns. I would not, therefore, have this police called upon to interfere in any manner whatever with what are merely and purely matters of local police regulation of the city. It is true, that so far as the general protection of person and property is concerned, it is both local and general; and hence I would furnish a police to act with and cooperate with the city police for the protection of person and property. But there are many things in which none but the citizens are interested. For instance, they have market regulations; they have regulations in relation to licenses and auctioneers; they have regulations in relation to their own municipal elections; and there are various other matters that are purely and exclusively local, which the Federal Government should leave, so far as it is possible, to the management of the people of this District. I may say, also, that there is another matter that is purely local, and in reference to which gentlemen upon this side of the House feel somewhat sensitive. I believe there are police regulations in this city in reference to the assemblage of blacks and mulattoes, especially those held in slavery; and I would not have the Federal Government have anything to do in enforcing those police regulations, or any others of a like character.

It may be said that one of the objects of this

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, APRIL 15, 1858.

NEW SERIES, No. 99.

bill is to protect the polls, to protect the people in the peaceable exercise of the elective franchise, and hence that the police that we furnish must interfere, more or less, in elections. My reply to that, is simply this, that unless there shall be such a combination either of citizens of the District or of those who come from abroad, for unlawful purposes, as amounts to a riot which shall endanger both person and property in the city, then there will be no necessity for the interference of any but the local police. The local police can ordinarily keep the peace at every election, but if there should be such a combination as I have alluded to, endangering the peace of the city, my amendment will not prevent a call upon the chief of the police that we furnish for the aid of his corps as well as of the police furnished by the city.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman is, perhaps, not aware of the fact that the corporate authorities now sustain a police at a cost of $20,000 a year, and we do not propose to dispense with that police. I will say to the gentleman, further, that in order to defray the expenses of the government of this city, the citizens of Washington now pay a tax of seventy-five cents upon the hundred dollars' worth of property, which is the maximum they are allowed to be taxed under the city charter.

Mr. BLISS. I am aware that there is a police already provided for in this city. I should not have been aware of it, however, if I had not been told so by those who say they know.

Mr. GOODE. I admit its inefficiency.

Mr. BLISS. If I were to judge from the necessity that calls for our action, I should not infer that there had been a police in the city. But my object is to so amend the bill as not to relieve the city from the continued obligation, not only to furnish the police that they already furnish, but to increase the force, and, if possible, increase its efficiency. The principle of the amendment is that the General Government and the city should go hand in hand and should be even in this respect. If there is any other proportion that would be more proper than that, I am willing to accept it. It is impossible to tell what should be the precise proportion. I voted against many of the measures of the last Congress for furnishing aid to the city, from the fact that no provision whatever was made for the city doing anything for itself. As for instance, I voted against the bill for building the aqueduct, not that I was not in favor of the General Government doing its share; but I was not in favor of relieving, and never voted to relieve, the people of the city altogether from the burdens of self-government.

But, sir, the gentleman says that the people here pay seventy-five cents on the $100 as taxes. I pay about one dollar and a quarter on the little I hold, each year; and some years I have paid as much as $250 on the $100, for special purposes. The people of this city may be taxed, but they are taxed much less than the people of the States; and they should not be relieved entirely from their taxes. The moment you relieve a man from the burden of supporting himself, you make a pauper of him, if he was not one before. The best thing you can do for any man is to compel him to stand on his own legs, and walk himself. But still, as I before remarked, the peculiar circumstances of this city require that Congress shall do something to aid the people in protecting themselves and us.

I did not propose, Mr. Chairman, to say anything that might seem to be of a general political character. Lest, however, I might be supposed to disagree with some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COMINS] as to some of the causes that have brought this necessity upon us, I must say that it is my settled conviction that, till there is a reform in the administration of justice in this city, there will be no security for life or property, whatever number of police we or the city may furnish.

Since I have been a temporary resident of this city, I have with pain observed the fact that crime stalks abroad with impunity. I have with pain seen men arraigned before the courts of this city, and suffered to go forth unpunished—not because there was any doubt of their commission of the crime, but because the crime was mixed up with the politics of the day; and until that state of things is reformed, (and I call on gentlemen on the other side of the House to use their influence towards that end,) we cannot expect to have order restored to this city. If that state of things be reformed, this city, instead of being a den of murderers and thieves and blacklegs, may become, for order and decorum, a pattern to the people of the States.

I designed merely to indicate the principle by which we should be governed in making appropriations for this city, and give notice of the amendments which I intend to offer, so soon as they shall be in order, which I think will make this bill conform to that principle. The proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] has other defects, which, I hope, in the progress of its consideration, will be so far remedied that I can vote for the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Inasmuch as I am opposed to this whole bill, I propose briefly to give reasons for that opposition. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I think that the gentleman from Virginia, who reported this bill, commits a great error when he assumes that the officers to be created by this bill are Federal officers. The objection I have to this bill is, first, because Congress does not, in my opinion, possess any power under the Constitution to pass it. The President of the United States is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy and militia. The force proposed to be raised here does not fall under that clause of the Constitution. In the next place, the right of appointment sought to be conferred upon the President of the United States, does not embrace the class of officers contemplated by the Constitution of the United States; because they are not United States officers, either by the Constitution, or by any law of the land.

In the next place, the legislation is radically wrong in policy. The least legislation that Congress attempts for the government of this District, the better for this people. I want to separate, as far as I can, the Federal power from the power that abides in the people here in the exercise of their corporate authority. You have got a legislative body in this District, elected by the people under their corporate authority; and they are competent to put in operation a system of police for their own safety and for their own protection—ininitely more competent than the two hundred and thirty-four members of Congress here, who are not familiar with the internal interests of the city. You have got seven wards in the city under your present local laws; you have got seven police stations, and the same number of police magistrates. Independently of local legislation, you have got, under act of Congress, an auxiliary guard, already established—consisting of a captain and fifteen men—at an expense of $17,000 a year. Now, unless there be some inherent moral defect in the sixty thousand people of this city, unless they have become demoralized, they can, by their own legislation, and by their own system of police, govern this city. But, if all the people in Washington city—as supposed by some gentlemen—have become so thoroughly demoralized that they cannot preserve order, cannot suppress riots, cannot punish disorder, then the additional members of the auxiliary guard proposed in this bill will not restore them to their lost condition.

And now I will examine the expenses under this bill. I assert, that they will not be less than $150,000 per annum. The bill provides for employing a chief at $2,500 a year, a captain at $1,400 a year, four lieutenants at $1,000 a year each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600, to be paid monthly. It gives to the chief the right to establish guard-houses anywhere in the city, at his discretion, without limitation as to number or cost. The guard-houses will cost at least $10,000 each. The seven will cost $70,000. The Senate bill proposes to set apart a contingent fund of $10,000. Add up all these items, and you will find that the cost under this bill will be $147,900. But I think the guard-houses will cost much more than $10,000 each; considering the usual outlay for public buildings here; and at the next session of Congress we will be called upon to incorporate in the deficiency bill $100,000 or $200,000 for this police. Independent of that, whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States it may be necessary, he may, under the provisions of this bill, call out two hundred men at two dollars a day, which is, in the aggregate, $400 per day.

Now, sir, this is not a political question. I am sorry that politics should have been brought into the controversy. I care nothing about the turmoils or troubles of the Democratic party, or of the American party. Congress has got nothing to do with them. But violations of the ballot-box on either side are disgraceful. I say that in legislating to correct the evils which exist in this city, we should not make it a political question or a political test.

What remedy do I propose? If I were going to legislate to protect the public property in this District—which I think is all we ought to do—I would establish an auxiliary guard similar in character to that established by law in 1842, consisting of a captain and fifteen men. I would pass a law making an injury to the public property here a penal offense. I would then make it the duty of this auxiliary guard to arrest persons found committing depredations on the public property, and to turn them over to the proper authorities to be tried and punished. You would then have a guard for the protection of the public property, composed of what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] calls Federal officers, entirely separate from the officers of the city proper, and you will have no collision. With such an arrangement, there is no conflict of jurisdiction, no disputes about power; and the expense of the General Government might always be calculated on with certainty. The people of the city will look to the expense incurred for their own police, because that expense is to be raised by taxation, and they will look to it that their money is not squandered. I will admit that their taxes are high now. I understand that they are about three fourths of one per cent. on the real and personal property. I think, however, they only tax improvements, and pay no regard to the value of the ground.

I do not know that I am right, but that is my opinion. At any rate, from the estimates which I have seen, they do not tax the value of city property so high as gentlemen tax the public property in the city. We contribute more than our proportion to the expenses of the city government and to protect property.

I have gone into a calculation of the expenses of the General Government in regard to this city, and it strikes me that we pay out more money for the expenses of this city, and for expenses incident to the District, than is paid by any city in the Union for the administration of its government, outside the city of New York. And when gentlemen come in here and ask us to raise $150,000 a year, not out of the people of the city, but out of the people of the United States, through the revenues of the Government, they should at least come here prepared to show what are the expenses of the Government already in this city—in the improvement of the streets, in the employment of a guard, and in everything which is paid by the Government for the benefit of the city—that we may judge whether the money has been spent with proper prudence or not. If the discretion is here, let us judge of the amount of money which it is proper that we should appropriate, and not take the amount from those who come here clamoring for an appropriation.

But, sir, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] says these are to be Federal officers. They do not belong to the Army, to the Navy, nor to the militia. There is no provision in the Constitution recognizing such officers. Where, then, do we get the power to appoint them? There has been no law passed which gives the Executive the power to create these Federal officers, whether they are executive, civil, or judicial officers; and they do not fall within either class. I think the utmost power we have got towards the legislation which is proposed, is to authorize the appointment of a guard or police sufficient to protect the public property growing out of the necessities of the Government.

Again, they have provided in this bill that this chief of police, with the Mayor, the district attorney, and the marshal of this District, shall establish rules and regulations for this guard. That contemplates, in my opinion, to some extent, legislative powers, because these rules and regulations certainly look to the efficiency of these men. They extend to them power to arrest a citizen on the streets, and, therefore, they must define the limits of power now attempted to be confided to this auxiliary guard; they must say in what cases they must arrest, and in what cases they must put a man in the watch-house, or the lock-up, as it is called. I say that some limitations should be put upon these one hundred men who are thus to be clothed with the powers and duties of police. No such power ought to be vested in the hands of the Mayor, in the hands of the Executive, or in the hands of any officer, where the law does not define the rule of action and make them responsible for their abuse of power.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Virginia to show me where any one of these one hundred men, or the chief, or captain, is made responsible for his conduct in office, for false imprisonment, or for false and malicious arrests. There is no restraint upon them; and I say, that in the absence of any law defining or limiting their powers, they would become a dangerous force in the midst of this people, and especially where they may engage in political excitements, and arrest any man at will, no matter how respectable he may be, if he differs from them politically.

So that I say, if we are to legislate upon this subject, let us legislate understandingly. I say, let the Mayor, the Common Council, and the corporate authorities, take the responsibility of regulating their own government, and enforcing their own police regulations, and you will then have no conflict between the Government of the United States and the local authorities.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not know that I can say all that I wish to on this question on account of the condition of my lungs; but I must say a few words. It was stated by the gentleman, the chairman of the committee who brought forward this bill, [Mr. GOODE,] that the men of this auxiliary guard would be Federal officers; and he made a constitutional point upon the proposed amendment of the gentleman from New York, that the power of appointment must be conferred upon the President of the United States or upon the Secretary of the Interior. He regards the force he is supplying as a Federal force, and the officers as Federal officers; and he proposes to give you a corps of one hundred Federal officers—for what? To carry out the police regulations of a municipal corporation. The charter of the city of Washington confers the right of appointment upon the Mayor; the right to establish, and the regulation of, the watch and of the police, upon the Board of Aldermen and Councilmen of this city. That charter confers municipal vested rights, and you cannot repeal them except through the judicial tribunals. Can the Congress of the United States repeal that act of incorporation except for an abuse of the charter privilege, or by the consent of the corporation?

The power of appointment is vested in the Mayor. The powers granted to the corporation involve all the power connected with police regulations, with the night and day watch, with the municipal administration, so far as the vigilance and detective police is concerned. But if you have the power of repeal, this is an attempt upon the part of this committee to usurp the powers of the corporation, and to vest them in the head of the General Government. I am opposed to it upon that ground. I say nothing at all about the partisan character of the bill, or of the partisan abuses which may flow from it. I plant my opposition to the bill, not only upon its general policy, but upon the positive illegality of the usurpation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, to see if I understood his position: Do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to assume the position that the act of incorporation of a city for municipal purposes cannot be modified, altered, or repealed, by the Government which incorporated it?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. By consent of the incorporators.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. And not without? Mr. MARSHALL. Not without, unless the power is reserved in the act of incorporation.

It is of no use to discuss the legal proposition as to the power to amend a charter. I present to you this fact: that here is a charter; that that charter is to-day the law of this city; and that the powers which this bill proposes to confer upon the President are by that charter conferred upon the Mayor and Board of Aldermen and Councilmen. This is not a bill to amend the charter; it is not a bill to repeal the charter. It is a bill to establish a corps of one hundred Federal officers. It is a proposition, without repealing that charter—a charter where this law prevails; where you leave these powers distinct; where you leave them express—to usurp the powers of this corporation by substituting a pretorian guard in their place—a uniformed corps of pensioners upon the Treasury—to do what? To carry out the police regulations of a municipal corporation.

Now, I ask gentlemen upon all sides of the House, without at all going into partisan views, whether that is not a small business for the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior? I hold that we had better leave the administration of municipal affairs in this city to the municipal council or head. If you want to give them an auxiliary guard, if you want to increase that force to one hundred men, expand the laws. You have now a law upon your statute-book for the establishment of an auxiliary guard. It did not occur to the legislators who passed that law that the appointing power in the city of Washington should reside anywhere else than in the Mayor, for the appointing power is given directly to him by the charter. Why do you want now, at this season of the year, to take away from the Mayor of the city of Washington the power which the charter confers upon him? Why do you want to vest in the President and the Secretary of the Interior the powers which are vested in the Mayor by the charter? Why, then, do you not attempt to repeal the charter? Why do you not attempt to modify the charter by taking away the power of appointment which the charter confers upon the Mayor? Why do you attempt to intervene by transferring the power to the President, and yet leave the law untouched? If it is the sense of Congress that the Mayor of Washington, who is the head of the municipality, ought not to have the power of appointing the police force, let us repeal the law. If you believe we have the power to repeal a municipal charter, let us repeal so much of it as relates to the power of appointment, and give it to the President. Let us not leave upon the statute-book a power conferred upon the Mayor by law, as the head of the civic administration, and at the same time give the power to appoint one hundred men to the President.

The charter of the city of Washington provides that all these men shall be removable at the pleasure of the Mayor. Are you going to leave it upon the statute-books that when the President of the United States appoints an officer here the Mayor of the city may remove him the next morning?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I desire to ask the gentleman, with his permission, another question. Suppose the Legislature passes two acts, one of which is inconsistent with the other: which act, the first or the last, is the law of the land?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will reply to that question in true Yankee fashion, by asking the gentleman from Georgia if he proposes, by this act, to repeal the appointing power of the Mayor?

Mr. BURNETT. So far as this guard is concerned.

Mr. GOODE. The Mayor has nothing to do with this.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. On turning to the charter, I find, among the powers of the Mayor, the following:

"He shall nominate and, with the consent of the Board of Aldermen, appoint all officers under the corporation, and may remove any said officer from office, at his will and pleasure.

And then, sir, the powers of the corporation are defined, to establish a watch or patrol, to establish such regulations as are necessary for the public health of the city, to provide for licensing, and so on, giving them all the possible powers which can belong to the police department of a city.

Now, you propose to do—what? To give to the Federal Executive the power of appointing one hundred men. To do what? Read your bill, and you will see that it is not only to protect person and property, but to enforce the laws that may be established by the corporate authorities of the city of Washington:

"There shall be established an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington."

Whose regulations? The regulations of the President, or of the Mayor and Board of Aldermen? You are creating this corps, to be appointed by the President, to carry out the regulations which these men may make under these chartered powers; and yet you tell me that they cannot exercise upon the appointees the removing power with which they are invested. It will not do.

Mr. SINGLETON. I would like the gentleman to look a little further into the bill, and see if he does not find that the head of the police, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, has power to remove these officers, thereby showing conclusively that the Mayor has no control over the matter?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It does not show that conclusively, to my mind, because many times have I seen a stream flow from two sources, as well as one. I admit that the bill gives the power of removal to the chief of police, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior; but I submit it to the gentleman, as a lawyer, that that does not exclude the conclusion that the Mayor may remove too.

Mr. SINGLETON. I think it does.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would plant myself upon that legal proposition if my head was at stake. There can be no difficulty about it. I take the position that, although you confer upon the head of the police the power to remove, if the charter confers upon the Mayor the power to remove the officers who are carrying out the police regulations of the city, those two powers of removal are not so distinct as to be incompatible with one another, and that the Mayor can remove under the charter, as well as your chief of police can under the law. Why not conform to the law? Why should we run into difficulty in order that the President may appoint these one hundred men? Why should we usurp the civic administration of this city, tax the Treasury of the people of this country, and, at the same time, deprive the people of this city of the power of self-government?

It will not be news to any of the members of this House, that I am not willing to see the President of the United States made the head of the civic administration of the police department of Washington. I think there is great soundness in the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD,] If we want a guard to protect the public property, let us take the matter from the civic administration of the city altogether, and establish a guard to protect the public property; but when we want a guard to protect person, and enforce the police regulations of the city of Washington, let us leave to the corporate authorities the creation of the force and the disposal of that force. Why drop the Mayor? Why not leave him this power that he has had? What is the matter with the Mayor? He is a gentleman of your own party. No man knows better than I do the extreme exertions that were made to place him in power. Why will you now, upon the very eve of his reelection, attempt, through this high House, to pronounce condemnation upon him? What has he done that you should attempt to strip the mayorality of this chartered power? What has he done? I do not choose to go into that branch of the question. I do not think it is likely to throw any light upon the subject, or upon the path which we ought to pursue. Certainly, I do not intend to do or say anything that would provoke the bitterness of partisanship here. But if this man who is now the head of the civic administration has so used the powers with which he has been invested, as to have brought down upon him the censure and want of confidence of his constituents, and of the gentlemen who constitute the Congress of the United States, let us remember that June is almost here; that the people will then have an opportunity to make another Mayor; and that, may be, they will select another and a better man for the office.

Now, sir, I would be the last man to suspect that the object of this bill is to take away from the people of this District the right and the power to have their own police appointed by their own officials. I cannot suspect that there lies concealed, under this proposition, any intent of that sort, or that the gentlemen of the Committee for the District of Columbia desire to take this power away from the Mayor, lest he may be a man opposed to Democratic sentiments, or that they want "to make assurance doubly sure," by taking it away before the election, and transferring it to the President of the United States! Surely there is no such thing as that in this bill?

Mr. BURNETT. Would you vote for the bill if the power of appointment was conferred on the Mayor?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I should then have no objection to voting for it, except my objection proceeded from one point—that is, as to the magnitude of the force. I prefer, I confess, that the power should proceed from a board of commissioners, if that can be done consistently with the rights vested in the Mayor. In fact, on reflection, my own opinion is that the Mayor of the city of Washington is the proper person to have this power of appointment and removal. If it should be the view of that side of the House to increase this force to one hundred men, leaving the power of appointment where it is now, to wit, in the Mayor, I shall make no objection. I do not know but I shall support it, although I think it likely that one hundred men for an auxiliary guard is more than a fair proportion to be supported by the Government. I think the Mayor and Aldermen ought to furnish an equal proportion.

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman for information whether there is any impediment now in the way of the Mayor and Aldermen of this city increasing the police force to a proper extent if they wish to do so?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. None that I know of.

Mr. GOODE. They have not the money, or the power of taxation to raise the money, to support an increased force.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky if there is any power in this bill to reduce the force at any time hereafter, if it be ascertained that one hundred men are more than are required for the good order of the city?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I suppose Congress has a right to modify or repeal the law at any time.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. But is there any power in the board of commissioners or the Secretary of the Interior to reduce this force of one hundred men to a lower point?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. So I understand.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. There is no discretionary power.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then the only remedy is in my proposition, that the Mayor shall have a right to remove them.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, these very inquiries show the impropriety of the course that has been pursued, and that we ought to have amended and perfected the bill before general discussion was had upon it. I have here an amendment which I desired to offer; and there are several other gentlemen also having amendments which, if offered, might have removed some of the objections that have been made to the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have said all that I suppose is necessary to say in regard to this bill. I think we ought to be guided by this rule, that we ought not certainly to furnish more men in the way of an auxiliary guard than the police force furnished by the city authorities. I think our auxiliary guard ought to be placed on exactly the footing of the police force itself, and under the control of the municipal authorities. I think that there is a propriety in the suggestion that the Mayor and civic administration here should have the free exercise of the power given to them by the charter. I think we ought to be ware and not establish a uniformed pretorian guard to be at the beck of the Secretary of the Interior or of the President, under the pretense of carrying out and enforcing the police regulations of a local municipal corporation.

Mr. BURNETT. I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to say anything at all in regard to the provisions of this bill. I had hoped that the bill was of such a character as would appeal to gentlemen on all sides of the House for their support. As a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, I certainly had no intention, when I agreed to report this bill to the House, of giving to it a party character. I have no intention now to do so. It is conceded on all sides of the House that legislation, in order to protect life and property in this District, is absolutely necessary; and the only difference of opinion that seems to exist, is as to the mode or manner of that legislation. And I must express my profound regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COMINS] felt himself called upon to endeavor to give to this bill a partisan character. Now, sir, I say to that gentleman, as I do to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BLISS,] that if there be abuses in the administration of justice here, under the courts that we have organized for the government of this District; and if he or they will introduce a bill having for its object the correction of these abuses, I will go as far as the furthest in wiping out everything like abuses. I am for having laws, and having those laws enforced, so long as they are on the statute-book. Grave charges have been made against our district court, and against the officer that presides over it. I do not know him. I know nothing about his ability as a lawyer, or about his integrity as a judge. If he has failed in the performance of his duties, there is a mode marked out for getting rid of him. But when we introduce a bill here for the purpose of regulating the police force of this District—a bill which, in my judgment, is absolutely demanded—I do hope that gentlemen will not, in their assaults on that measure, endeavor to array party against party, and to appeal to the prejudices on this side or on the other.

My colleague [Mr. MARSHALL] has discovered a new principle in law, if I understand him correctly, and that is, that the Legislature which creates a charter has no power to alter or amend that charter without the consent of the corporators. I find that under the Constitution the Congress of the United States is made the sole legislative power or this District. Congress has the power to pass all laws for its government. The Constitution confers this power upon it, and you will find that that power carries with it not only the power to repeal the charter and the power to abolish the municipal government, but also the sole and exclusive right to legislate for the people here directly. If we saw proper to exercise that power, we might to-day wipe out the city charter. Under the Constitution of the United States, this Congress has the power to legislate exclusively for the people of this District, and to pass all needful rules and regulations for their government. I do not say that I am in favor of any such measure. I would be opposed to it; but yet I say the power exists; and under that power we have the right to amend, alter, or change the charter of the city government at will.

What else? My colleague takes the position, furthermore, of a lawyer, (and I admit that he is a very able lawyer,) that under the provisions of the city charter, which confers on the Mayor the power of appointment, if you pass a subsequent law which says that the appointing power shall be lodged elsewhere, the Mayor still can exercise the power of removal at his will. That is his proposition, as I understand it. It is to confer upon a different set of men the power to make the appointment of these officers; and when that power has been exercised under the law, that there is no power that can change or alter the appointment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think my colleague does not comprehend my argument.

Mr. BURNETT. I certainly do not desire to do my colleague injustice.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Of course not; but I think my colleague did not comprehend my proposition. My proposition is this: while your charter remains the law of the land, conferring the power of appointment and removal on the Mayor, yet, although you may confer the power to appoint a particular police force on the President, that does not, ex vi termini, take away from the Mayor the power of removal.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood my colleague perfectly, but I think he does not take into consideration that this is for the appointment of a force outside the city charter, independent of it, and in no way governed or controlled by the city charter.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will my colleague suffer me to interpolate a word right there? My argument embraced that proposition distinctly. It was this: that if you undertook to organize this police outside the city charter, and leave untouched the law vesting in the Mayor the power of regulating the police force of the city, the power of appointment and removal will of necessity remain with him.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to call the attention of my colleague to the seventh section of this bill, which repeals all laws inconsistent with this act.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the third section of the bill?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; I cannot yield further. Now, I understand my colleague not to be opposed to the passage of a law increasing the police force in this city, provided he can be satisfied as to the appointing power. I understand him to be in favor of the appointment of commissioners for that purpose.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think the Mayor is best.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well. My colleague spoke of the appointment of a board of commissioners. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD,] my colleague on the Committee for the District of Columbia, recommends, I believe, the conferring of this power upon a board of commissioners. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LERRER] proposed to confer the power upon a board of three persons, mentioned by name. Now, here is the objection to these propositions: you divide the responsibility; you lodge the responsibility in the hands of three or four persons; and when you do that you weaken the efficiency of the appointees.

But, sir, what is the reason given for this proposed amendment? It is said that the object is to prevent the power from being lodged where it will be used for partisan purposes. If the objection was well taken, I would go with the gentleman who made the proposition, because I do not want to give it any such character, or confer any such powers. But let us examine the proposition for a moment. The gentleman from New York proposes to make this board of commissioners elective by the people. What is the history of the elections in Washington city? The present Mayor, elected by the people, is said to be a Democrat. He has, in his appointment, fifty-two men under the city charter, in addition to the fifteen men who have been alluded to as the auxiliary guard, paid for out of the public Treasury. With this force of sixty-seven men, under the authority of the officers of the city government, how are the police regulations of the city executed? How are they managed? You find here murder as a matter of every day occurrence, with arson, burglary, and every crime known in the catalogue; and yet the Mayor, with this force of police under him, has been totally inefficient in suppressing these outrages. You have seen these crimes committed day after day, and what effort has the Mayor, with his police force, made to prevent them? If he has endeavored to execute the laws of this city, he must certainly have a most inefficient body of men placed under him.

Now, sir, if you confer the appointing power upon the Mayor, you can only judge of the future by the past; and when you look back into the past to see how the laws have been executed, you find that, with the appointing power vested in the Mayor, and with a considerable force under him, the laws have not been executed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Did you ever hear any complaints until the present Mayor was in office?

Mr. BURNETT. I will just say to my colleague that I may not remember of other instances, but I take the times as we find them. I speak of the present; and I propose to find a remedy for the evils as they now exist. I am told by gentlemen around me that these things have occurred before.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have been here for the last eight or ten years, and I never heard of them before.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not intend to find fault with the present Mayor. But I say that there will never be an effective city government here until the property-holders take the matter into their own hands. They must elect men who will see that the laws are faithfully executed; and they must take such men without reference to whether they are politically Americans or Democrats. I know nothing personally in reference to the present Mayor. I know the facts which are stated daily in the city papers, that crimes are daily committed and the offenders are not brought to justice. I am for organizing a police force that we can ourselves control, and who will protect the public buildings and property; who will protect the members of Congress; who will protect our constituents who are here on business; and who will protect the foreign corps who are here with their attachés and families.

But, sir, reference has been made to the present police of the city. I have been a member of this House since 1855, and I never have seen a policeman until they have been required to wear a uniform; and I must say, from the specimens I have seen, they are a miserable set of policemen. I see them wearing uniform. They are made conservators of the peace; and I met two of them upon the streets, a day or two since, and both of them were drunk. That is the character of a portion of the police of this city. How does this bill propose to remedy the evil? When gentlemen talk about the Federal Government supporting this expense, they ought to remember that we already pay for twenty-six men, whose appointment is in the hands of the Mayor. I am for increasing that force to one hundred men, and taking the power of appointment from the Mayor, and conferring it upon some man who is responsible, and who will see that good and efficient men are appointed. What better mode can be devised than that provided in this bill? You see that this power has not been so exercised by the Mayor as to secure peace, and the observance and execution of the law. If you lodge the power in a commission of three or half a dozen men, the very reasons which now render it necessary to take the power from the Mayor will apply to them; for they will be voted for on account of their political sentiments, and those commissioners will be either Democrats or Americans, according to which party has the ascendancy here. Then the objection that your police force would be partisan will apply as well under a board of commissioners elected by the people, as it does under appointments made by the Mayor.

Now, I know nothing of the gentlemen who are named in the bill of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER.]

Mr. LEITER. I have amended my proposition. I have stricken out the name of Walter Lenox, and inserted the name of James G. Berrett.

Mr. BURNETT. Let us look at this proposition. This board of commissioners are appointed by name. If you happen to get into that board of commissioners, partisans, will not the same power be there which you are afraid to confer upon the President? They can wield that power as strongly for partisan purposes as the President can in the appointment of the chief—and that is only one out of the hundred men who are to be appointed. Suppose you get in a board of commissioners whose characters partake of the same elements as compose those of the violators of law now in our midst: it would be a very dangerous power to be conferred upon them, and one which might be exercised for great mischief instead of good.

Why am I in favor of the provision of the bill which confers this power upon the President? The first question we determine is, Congress has the power. Where do we get it? From the Constitution of the United States. The next question is, why confer upon the President the appointment of the chief? I will not pretend to go into a constitutional argument of the question, because I do not profess to be a constitutional lawyer, but I do profess to understand plain common sense, when it is presented. You find in the Constitution these words:

"Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Now, I hold that we have the right to confer this appointing power upon the President. I will not take the reverse position that we have the power to confer it upon other than those named in the clause of the constitution which I have read. While I would give it as an off-hand opinion that we could not, I will not take that position, because I have not fully investigated the question. But I say that it is wiser to lodge the power there for the reason that we have a guarantee that the President will give us at least a man of character, and a man who has integrity to exercise the power conferred upon him for the good of the community.

Under the provisions of the bill the chief of police will have the power to appoint, and the power to remove, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. It seems to me that this is the very best provision, so far as the appointment of these officers is concerned, that we could possibly have.

Now, sir, as to the question whether we should tax the Federal Treasury for this purpose, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BLISS,] that this city is different from any other. Congress has exclusive power of legislation over it. It has no representative upon this floor. We legislate for them. Here is located public property, and the public records, costing millions upon millions. It is certainly our duty to establish a police force for the purpose of protecting that property; and not only that, but to protect the representatives of the people, who come here to legislate for the people at large. It is also our duty to protect those who may come here upon public business from every section of the Union, and to protect the representatives of foreign Governments.

Now, I put it to gentlemen to say whether we ought not to pay the expense out of the Federal Treasury. We have been for years paying twenty-six men, and we only propose now to increase that force. We simply increase, instead of lessen the amount. I ask whether each gentleman upon this floor will not agree that some legislation for the protection of life and property is necessary? If there is any member here who does not believe that we ought to adopt some measure, in addition to those already existing, for the purpose of securing life and property, he has paid no attention to what has been going on here. We find scenes of disorder and violence occurring every night. I do not think I am a greater coward than my fellow-men. I do not think I have less bravery than the majority of men; and yet, I say here that I have regarded the outrages in this city of such a character, and of such frequent occurrence, that I have thought that every man, when he leaves his room, ought to go armed; for he does not know at what moment an attack may be made upon him. Respectable men have been assaulted, and members of this House have been threatened. I say we ought to take this matter into our own hands, and pass some bill which will effectually protect life and property.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire to say a few words upon this subject.

Mr. BURNETT. Allow me one moment further. Remarks have been made here upon the subject of the city government paying its own expenses. The people of this city, as I understand it, are now taxed to the extent that the power of taxation is conferred by the charter upon the city government, and they have no right to go any further.

Mr. SINGLETON. It seems, Mr. Chairman, that from some cause which up to this moment has not been explained, the laws which have been passed by Congress for the protection of life and property in this city, have not been enforced. Who is to blame, or where the difficulties have sprung up which prevent the execution of these laws, I do not know. But it is a well-settled fact, that no man can now walk the streets of Washington after dark in security. We are sent here to perform high and responsible duties, and are expected to encounter the dangers that result from our positions, but certainly it was never contemplated by those who sent us to Washington that we were liable to be assaulted on the streets at night by assassins. And I say to you very candidly, that although, like the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] I feel that I am not a coward, yet I will not walk the streets of this city, after dark, without a revolver in my pocket, and being prepared for self-defense.

Now, as I have already said, I know not who is at fault, but that matters not. It is perfectly certain that some remedy ought to be found for the evils which exist. We are not expected to run these risks. Our friends are here on business; the diplomatic corps are here, and it is not expected that they shall run the gauntlet. These assassins do not seem to be very particular whom they assault. Now, how is this state of things to be remedied? We see that it is not done by the city police. We see that this thing goes on day after day. A murder or some other outrage has been committed almost every twenty-four hours for the last three or four weeks. And are we to sit by and see these things going on without applying some remedy for the evil? We legislate, as the gentleman from Kentucky has remarked, for this District, and if the legislation which has been had heretofore is not sufficient for the protection of life and property, it is our especial duty to look into the matter and afford other means of protection. Now, if I understand this measure, it is not intended to break down the city police or to interfere with the civic authorities except so far as it becomes necessary to an efficient organization of a guard for this city. It is not proposed to repeal the charter. This law is merely ancillary to the law already in force, and only repeals it in so far as it may be inconsistent with this bill. Now, sir, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who is an able lawyer, as all concede, declares that unless you repeal, in so many words, the city charter, so far as the appointment and removal of the police is concerned, the officers who may be appointed now by the chief of police, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, will be liable to be removed by the Mayor of the city; and he read this clause for the purpose of showing that such was the case. Defining the authority of the Mayor, the law provides:

"He shall nominate and, with the consent of the Board of Aldermen, appoint all officers under the corporation, except commissioners of election, and may remove any such officer from office at his will and pleasure."

"May remove any such officer." What does that mean? Why, just such officers as he may himself appoint, he may remove, and no others.

But, if any further proof were needed to show that the gentleman from Kentucky is at fault for once, it would be found in this, that in the act itself, now under consideration, the power to appoint and remove is vested in the chief of the police, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior; and I would ask the gentleman, as a lawyer, what becomes of the old law maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius? The fact that the power to remove is given to the chief of police, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, is conclusive that it is not conferred upon the Mayor of the city. But the bill goes further, and repeals all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions. Could anything, then, be clearer than the fact that the Mayor will have no power to interfere with these officers?

But some gentlemen say that this force of one hundred men may not always be needed; and yet, you will be bound to retain it. Why does not the bill itself, as I have already said, give to the chief of police power, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, to remove these men whenever he thinks proper to do so, with or without cause? Whenever, therefore, it becomes necessary, or is safe to diminish this force, they will do so. We must have some confidence in the men who are to control these appointments and removals. We must repose some confidence in their judgment and fidelity; and suppose that, whenever it is safe to do so; whenever these outlaws shall have been rooted out of Washington, they will reduce this force, or dispense with it altogether. I think that this is a very small objection to the bill.

But there is another remark which I desire to make. I think that the fault of the exciting state of affairs in this city must lie with the people of the city to some extent, and with the city authorities. I find, from an examination of the records, that you have in Washington one hundred and thirty groceries, large and small, licensed to retail spirituous liquors in quantities less than a pint, and these are kept open from daybreak until midnight. There are about five thousand seven hundred voters in the city of Washington, and this gives us a grocery for every sixty men! But that is not all. I find that, in addition to these, there are one hundred and seventy-one grocery stores licensed to sell liquor in quantities not less than a pint, and many of these, I have no doubt, violate the law and sell as little as three cents' worth. The one hundred and seventy-one added to the one hundred and thirty make three hundred and one establishments in the city of Washington that are authorized by law, licensed by the city authorities, to sell liquor; or one for every twenty-four men in the city. I would like to know if such a state of things exists anywhere else?

Pass along Pennsylvania avenue, the great thoroughfare of the city, and in almost every other house a faro bank is to be found, familiarly called the "tiger," where you can step in and get rid of your money just as soon as you choose. [Laughter.] And this thing goes on in open daylight. It can not be unknown to the city authorities, and while the evil lies with the people of the city, or rather with the city authorities, who license the groceries and permit the gambling establishments to carry on their operations, although we may increase the police force to five hundred men, there is no possible chance of putting down this thing unless the good men of the city interest themselves in the matter. I do hope, therefore, that the property-holders and men of standing and character will unite and aid us, as members of Congress, in our efforts to root out this set of plunderers and assassins who have crept into this metropolis, and are making it a hiss and a by-word for the whole country. When this change is made in their police regulations, when these dens of iniquity are closed, we may expect a better state of morals in the community, and that life and property will have some protection; but not before.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is no person that can be more deeply impressed with the propriety of taking some active measures to put an end to the state of things of which gentlemen have spoken, than I am myself. As to those establishments of which my colleague has spoken, I have no familiarity with them, and therefore cannot speak about them; but I take it for granted that my young friends here are better informed on that subject than I am. But the question here is not, whether we shall suppress these establishments, and use our efforts to suppress crime; but the question is, whether the measure before Congress is calculated even to aid in the suppression of crime, and in the restoration of peace and good order to the city.

I have been of the opinion that for the purpose of carrying out the object desired, and of preventing and putting a stop to the gross demoralization which exists, and of preventing the perpetration of offenses that are now being committed in the broad light of day as well as in the darkness of the night, brute force is not the one thing necessary. We want the work of the head. We want the work of the heart. We want intelligence, energy, and activity on the part of the officers. I go upon the principle that fifty policemen, directed by an intelligent and active head, capable of planning means to detect crime and to punish it, and capable of ameliorating any errors that exist in the court of law for the punishment of crime, would do vastly more good than a thousand other policemen.

I very much doubt whether an addition to the police force of this city, to so large an extent as is proposed, would be productive of any good. There is never any resistance to the present force on the part of these malefactors. What is required is a head, an intelligence, an activity, and a spirit to execute the laws. It requires also good morals on the part of the people of the city, and all this cannot be had by a simple addition of brute force to the police.

I have several objections, Mr. Chairman, to this measure, whatever phase it may assume, and gentlemen will do me the credit to believe that I discard all party considerations from it. I have not looked at it, nor did I think it capable of being looked at in a party light. I look at it as simply a measure for suppressing crime, but I think that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Let us exert ourselves in ameliorating the law; let us address ourselves to the intelligence of the people of Washington, instead of supposing that a mere police force is going to restore a moral and correct tone to the people. All that we hear may be true; I have seen no evidence of it, and I confess I sometimes walk the streets rather with a curiosity to see whether anybody will attack me, but I have thus far escaped the hands of the assassin. Still there may be, I admit, a very demoralized state of public feeling in this city; but that, in my humble opinion, cannot be corrected by an increase of the police force. Where are your magistrates? In such a condition of things, they ought to be here, there, and everywhere, watching actively to suppress crime, and arrest the offenders. My opinion is that the present police force is sufficient for every purpose for which it is proposed to increase it.

Believing, then, Mr. Chairman, that this measure is entirely unnecessary and will not answer the purpose, I shall vote against it in every phase and shape it may assume. I believe it is unnecessary, I believe it can have no salutary effect. On the contrary, if this chief of police, with so much power to appoint all the officers and men should be idle or careless, the force under him would be worse than useless. He may be honest, he may be patriotic, he may be influenced by no party bias, and yet he may be entirely unfitted for such a position. There is not one man in a thousand capable of performing the duty of a chief of police. It requires peculiar character. In the whole empire of Napoleon there was not one man who could fill the place of Fouché. If I could believe that this bill would effect the object that these gentlemen intend, I might be induced to waive my other objections. But I have another great objection, and that is, against giving this national Government the control of this pretorian guard without some strong reason. It is not only a force of a hundred men, but the bill contains a provision authorizing the President to add to it two hundred more.

Mr. GOODE. If the gentleman will read the bill, he will find that it gives the President no such power.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have read the bill; and, in my opinion, it establishes a permanent system upon our Government which it will be very difficult to get rid of.

Mr. BLISS. I understand the gentleman to say that this is starting out with a new policy, or inaugurating a new system. Am I misinformed, or have we not for many years supported a police force in this city?

Mr. QUITMAN. I will explain the matter to which the gentleman refers. The system is not entirely new. I am told that an auxiliary police force is now supported by the Government.

My own opinion is, that we should establish a small detective police force here, and make it a part of the machinery of the Government. Gentlemen are mistaken that the force they propose to establish will make a permanently better state of things, unless they suppose that the morals of the great political collection of men here will be reformed by time; and I am afraid it will require something more than the mere lapse of time to correct some of the evils which grow out of this great collection of politicians.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed very briefly—for I do not intend to make an argument—to present my own judgment of the merits of the bill now before us. Independent of its mixing up the powers of the General Government with that of the municipal authorities; independent of its nationality; independent of its centralization—independent of all that, I have other objections. It is true that the sole and exclusive legislation over the District rests in Congress; but there is no more reason why Congress should pay for the police of the city of Washington, than for the city of Georgetown, or any other point within the limits of the District. As well might they place a special police wherever there is property located. Because the legislative power over the District rests in Congress, it is no more right to establish a special police here, at the cost of the Government, than for any other city in the United States, certain portions of which may be under the control of the Government. It is not in accordance with the principles of our Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, the strongest argument I have heard in support of this bill is, that it is our duty to protect members of Congress and the representatives of foreign Governments here, from the dangers which surround them. As to the protection of members of Congress, the better mode would be to order a battalion here from the Army, and give to each member of Congress a special guard to accompany him and protect him. It is the duty of the Government to protect members of Congress; but why not protect them through the military force? They would not be protected by a mere increase of the police force of the city, unless each member should have one stationed for his especial protection. We already have at hand a military force, which may be called out by order of the President to support the police force, if that should be insufficient. The reasons, therefore, which are assigned in favor of this bill are, in my opinion, not sufficient to remove the serious objections against the establishment of this description of military force at the seat of Government.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will my colleague suggest a better remedy than the one contemplated by this bill? It is much easier to find fault with a bill introduced by others, than to frame one to meet existing evils, which is liable to no such objections.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am not on the Committee for the District of Columbia, and the details of this matter are not peculiarly under my charge. I would select half a dozen honest, intelligent, active men, and make them a detective police. I would make it their especial duty to see that all cases of crime were reported, and that the laws for the punishment of crime were carried out.

Mr. SINGLETON. Whom would my colleague fix on to appoint these detective officers?

Mr. QUITMAN. The President.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman will see at once that he yields to the principle, which a while ago he combated—that is, increasing Federal patronage, by giving the President power to appoint.

Mr. QUITMAN. I do not know that any plan would be entirely unobjectionable to me; and I am only speaking of one less objectionable than the one before us, and one more likely to secure the end aimed at in creating this additional force.

Mr. Chairman, my principal objection is this: this demoralization cannot be suppressed by force, although it may be by legislation; and there may be a good result reached, if the committee, with the talent it has displayed, will turn its attention to the moral and intellectual interests of this community.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Mississippi, who has just taken his seat, is unquestionably right in stating the difficulties under which we are laboring and the demoralization which pervades society here. I propose for a moment to inquire into the origin of that demoralization. I do not mean, in the remarks which I shall submit to the committee, to be governed by any party prejudice. I have no doubt whatever that the difficulties which pervade and demoralize society here, originated in that piratical political maxim, that to the victors belong the spoils. It is a maxim which has perhaps been practiced by all parties, and for which no party is specially responsible at this day. But, sir, that this is the origin of these difficulties, no man who will look to the progress and tendency of things can doubt for a single moment. Here is the great center of political power and patronage. Here is the fountain head from which they are distributed. Here is the place where all the seekers for office at the hands of power congregate for the purpose of receiving rewards for partisan services. Whenever you once establish the maxim that to the victors belong the spoils, and that the offices and emoluments of the Government, immense as they are, shall be dispensed to partisans as rewards for partisan services, you have established a principle which results in the demoralization of society, and the corruption and eventual overthrow of the Government; for when it is once settled that partisan services are to be rewarded, it follows necessarily and legitimately that the more valuable and the more efficient the services, the greater shall be the reward.

It is not merely that a man shall be rewarded by patronage because he is a fine stump speaker, and canvasses his district ably, but that a man shall be rewarded who exerts an influence; no matter what the means may be, no matter how censurable the act may be in morals, if it insures success, that alone is a sufficient claim for a reward. Hence, Mr. Chairman, you see that all through the politics of the country, men who control elections, men who interfere with the controlling power of the country, are the men who are singled out for the purpose of receiving rewards of patronage, which are dispensed by the party in power. The consequence is, that in cities, men who can bring to the polls most votes, fraudulent or not, that your ballot-box stuffers, your shoulder-hitters, those who are engaged in keeping orderly citizens from the polls, must be rewarded, if those services bring success to the party for whose benefit they are rendered. This is the inevitable and legitimate result; and I have no doubt in my own mind this day, that this country owes, to a great extent, its present political position to the great political frauds practiced in New York, in 1844, by which a candidate for the presidential office was defrauded of the office to which he was entitled by the lawful votes of the people. I believe that that presidential election was controlled by a band or club known as the "Empire Club," whose captain is now marshal of the southern district of New York.

Such is the tendency of these things, and to this condition have you now come. Who committed these depredations in this city? What is it that brings men here, and what is the character of the men who come here? Why, sir, men are brought here for the purpose of receiving their rewards for services of this kind: for stuffing ballot-boxes; for driving legal voters away from the polls; for marching up illegal ones; for services of that kind are supposed to be rewarded if those who render them will come here and make the demand. Then what must be the character of those men who congregate here for the purpose of receiving rewards for such services? They are men in whose hands I should not think myself safe in a dark night. They come here in shoals, by the hundreds and thousands, but they cannot all be provided for. Their name is legion. And extended and unbounded as this patronage is, the claimants are more numerous than this patronage can satisfy. They come here, they are disappointed, their funds are exhausted, and they resort to other modes of getting a support.

Mr. CLEMENS. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the very fact of the inefficiency of the police of this city is not an inducement to the abandoned characters of other cities to make this a refuge and a home?

Mr. STANTON. I think it very probable. It is so, for aught I know, but that matter is not exactly in the line of remarks I was submitting.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to know of my colleague whether he is prepared to support a measure that will cut off from the foreign emigrants brought here under the circumstances which he has very eloquently depicted, the right to vote?

Mr. STANTON. I do not precisely understand the pertinency of the question to the subject in hand. I certainly do not propose to deprive any man who has the right of suffrage from the exercise of that right; but I do propose that no man, whether foreigner or native, shall vote more than once, or shall vote anywhere except where he is entitled to vote.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Another question.

Mr. STANTON. No, sir; it is not in the line of my argument. I am discussing now the cause and the origin of this state of society here, and the danger to life and limb which the bill seeks to guard against.

I have said, sir, and I believe I have said truly, that it has its origin in this false doctrine, this distribution of the patronage of the Government upon a vicious and piratical principle. Now, that same party prejudice and party bias, that same principle will prevail in this District in the government and control of the police force, and in the appointment of police officers, if you confer this power, as it does in all other appointments. Suppose that you confer upon the President of the United States power to appoint a chief of police:

do you not believe, sir, that he would appoint a partisan—one who has strong claims upon him for partisan services? Why, sir, it would be a miracle in these days if he did not. And who will that chief of police appoint as his lieutenants and his force of one hundred men? Will he not select them from those gentlemen who are congregated here from all parts of this Confederacy in search of office? Will not he select them for these places, and give them these appointments as policemen and members of the auxiliary guard of this city? Why, it was stated in the newspapers not a week ago, that a man who was arrested, and is now in prison for murder, had, the day before his arrest, and after the commission of the crime with which he stands charged, been appointed one of the assistant or auxiliary guards. I am told—it is a matter of common rumor, I do not pretend to know how true it is—that the disorders arise to a great extent from rival fire companies, and among the rest is a company known by the name of the States' Hose. I am told—I do not know how true it is—that the captain of this company, which, it is charged, is engaged in committing these depredations, holds an office under the President of twelve or fourteen hundred dollars a year.

Several MEMBERS. "Name him."

Mr. STANTON. No, sir; I do not know how true it is. I may be misinforming, and, therefore, I will use no names.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am deeply interested in the information which the gentleman from Ohio has given the House. Will he—if he may be mistaken—give us his authority for it?

Mr. STANTON. I have it from half a dozen persons.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The gentleman can mention the first, and most reliable of those persons.

Mr. STANTON. It is a common rumor—known to everybody in the city.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Ah, I believe it, then, if it is common rumor.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am asked to vote to make the President of the United States chief of police, and to give him control of the police force of this city, to which I am to look for the protection of my person. Thank the Lord I have no property here. Now, I want to call your attention to a few facts that I vouch for, and do not base upon common rumor. I know that the President of the United States has appointed to office men who were under indictment at the time of their appointment for the murder of my political friends in Kansas. Sir, there are half a dozen men charged with murder, many of them indicted, subject to prosecution, to conviction, and to be hung, who have been appointed by the President registers and receivers of land offices, Indian agents, and postmasters. The records of the country show this. There is Mr. Frederick Emory, who has been appointed register at LeCompton in Kansas, and who was, at the time of his appointment, under indictment in the Territory for murder, and the fact was known to the President and to the Cabinet. Now, I do not want such a chief of police as that to appoint a police force to protect my person.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that you may organize a police force that cannot be made the blind instrument of party despotism; but I know, I feel perfectly assured from the history of the past, that if you pass the bill for the organization of a police force, the very men who are engaged in the commission of crime will be enlisted in that force, and you will have an organized ruffianism instead of a disorganized one. I believe so, sir, for various reasons—amongst others, the one that I shall now mention. There was an election held in this city last June, at which some eighteen men were shot down, it is generally believed unnecessarily; whether criminally or not, is a matter about which we might dispute, but it is generally conceded that there was no necessity for it at the time and under the circumstances. And yet the officer of the marines has been promoted for that unnecessary service. I say, therefore, that I am opposed to the organization of such a police force as this. I am equally opposed to a police that will be under the sole power and control of the Mayor, because he must appoint either one party or the other. If the American party succeed here and elect their Mayor I think the probability is that foreign-born citizens might have a hard time at the next election, and I think it very likely that if a Democrat should be elected, these "plug uglies" would have a hard time at the next election.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will establish a police board that is balanced as to parties, so that no man on the board can claim an appointment as a matter of right for political services, but must rest upon the character of his candidate for appointment, I believe that you may rescue the police force from the domination of party power. The proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Dobb], which I support, provides for the election of four police commissioners, of whom no person shall vote for more than two, and the four having the highest number of votes are to be declared elected. The consequence would be, that each party must of necessity elect two of the commissioners, unless one party had more than twice as many votes as the other, and divided their votes exactly equally—a contingency which I apprehend no one supposes likely to happen. I take it for granted that each party would elect two members of the board, and each would operate as a negative on the other side to prevent the appointment of improper persons on the police force. If a rowdy, or a burglar, or a man of intemperate habits, or one who, for any other reason, was improper to be appointed, should be presented by his party friends, his political opponents on the board would inquire into his character and reject him. Take the patronage and power of the municipal government out of the hands of politicians; constitute a board like that, having no object in view but the peace, welfare, and prosperity of the city; and I believe that something may be accomplished.

I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] that it is all idle to strengthen your guards. There must be other legislation beyond a bill of this sort, for the purpose of perfecting and calling out a police force essential to the good government of this city. It may be, and probably is true, that the police force at present is large enough, but for some reason or other it is utterly inefficient. It must change hands. It must be placed where it is, not to be used at your elections for the purpose of securing the triumph of one party and the defeat of another, but it must be placed in hands where it will be used for the impartial protection of the political rights and political privileges, as well as for the personal security of every citizen, no matter to what party he may belong.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say myself as to the pay of this police. That is a secondary consideration. There is, however, this remark to be made, and I am not certain that any of the bills sufficiently avoid the evil, and that is, that this bill of the majority of the committee creates an auxiliary guard, not under the control of, or organized with, or as a part of, the regular force of the city; and you will consequently have the auxiliary guard and the police force working against one another, and counteracting each other's movements and operations.

The police force of this city ought to be a unit. You ought to have this auxiliary guard that is paid out of the national Treasury incorporated with and made part of the city police, subject to the same government and to the same control. I am informed by citizens of Washington that if one of the police of the city now is about to make an arrest, and finds himself likely to be overpowered, and if a member of the auxiliary guard be within ten feet of him, he will not raise a hand. And so it is, vice versa, if a member of the auxiliary is overpowered, the police will not assist him. They are rival institutions—that is the term. You ought to make your police force homogeneous; you ought to have all incorporated into one body, to work together; and, in my judgment, the proper mode would be to provide that the city treasury should defray twenty-five or fifty per cent. of the expenses, so that the city might by that means have an interest in the disbursement of the fund, and might see that it is spent with a proper regard to economy.

Mr. GOODE. That is so now; and we have no efficient police.

Mr. STANTON. It is undoubtedly true that we have no efficient police; but I think that is because it is under the influence of a partisan Mayor who uses it for party purposes, and for no other purpose.

Mr. GOODE. Therefore I wish to take it from him.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly, sir; but to give it to the President is as bad as to leave it with the Mayor.

Mr. GOODE. The President cannot get votes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STANTON. I understand the influence and political control of the District of Columbia as well as the gentleman from Virginia does. He knows very well that the General Government spends a good deal of money and works pretty hard and requires its employees to make contributions for the use of the Democratic party of the District. It is the central point from which the politics of the country are disseminated. I think, myself, that this bill ought to be so modified as to make the police board elective in the manner proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD.] Place the whole police force under the control of that board. Let a portion of the expenses be defrayed by the city treasury and a portion by the national Treasury, and let us, as far as we can, get rid of the idea that no man is entitled to any post of honor or profit or emolument under the Government, except as a reward for political service. If a man were recognized as having some claim on account of his intrinsic merits, his integrity, his capacity for the station, without having to square his opinions precisely with those of the gentleman who occupies the house at the other end of the avenue, we would get on a thousand times better. That is the great difficulty.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is known to us all, Mr. Chairman, and therefore, perhaps, it is unnecessary to be referred to, that this District of Columbia was created by the Federal convention in order to give exclusive jurisdiction to the Government to be located here. With that exclusive jurisdiction was, of course, imposed the imperative duty of preserving the public peace within these limits. With a view to facilitate that object, and for no other purpose, as a town grew up here a city government was created, and certain classes of power were delegated to it affecting the local interests of the people located here. I hold that it is perfectly clear that there is an absolute and unqualified power in this Government to modify the authority thus conferred, at any time, and under any circumstances. Independently of this, we propose here, by the bill in question, to provide for the execution of the power conferred on us by the Constitution. And why? Because the government created heretofore is not sufficient to accomplish the purposes required from it, to wit: to preserve the peace and order of the District of Columbia. I shall not, however, dwell upon these views, but will proceed now to other views in connection with them.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BLISS] made a very slight objection, and I have an amendment here, prepared for the purpose of obviating that, for that objection struck me in common with him. There will be no difficulty, I presume, in introducing an amendment that will reconcile us both, perhaps, to some bill.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who last spoke [Mr. STANTON] has traced the disorders of this city to what is certainly a most remarkable source. He says that they are entirely attributable to the great doctrine for which both parties, it seems, are responsible—that to the victors belong the spoils.

Sir, the object of creating this District government was to give a jurisdiction to the Federal Government from which party was to be excluded. It was expected that here, at least, there would be a power exclusive in its character, and which would effectually preserve the Administration and the Federal authorities from the influence and dangers of party strife. I say here to the gentleman that it is a most refined and metaphysical reference to the disorder of this city; and that I presume it is utterly impossible for him to show a single case of an individual being a party to any proceedings of violence in this city who has an application for appointment in the hands of the Federal authorities. I say here, and at this time, that of all the disorders that have disturbed the repose of this city, and rendered unsafe its streets and avenues, there is not a single instance where such disorder has come from any person in pursuit of a Federal appointment. I have not heard of a single case, and I do not believe that applicants for office are the persons who come here to disturb the public peace. Sir, every gentleman who is an applicant for office is presumed to have a representative here, and he can tell if there are any such cases. I defy proof, and until there is proof exhibited, it is to be presumed there is no such case.

Mr. KILGORE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the person who made an assault upon the Secretary of the Interior the other day was not an applicant for office?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. He is not one of the persons connected with those scenes to which we are now having particular reference. That is one of those cases which might have sprung up in any condition of society. He was not a midnight murderer. He was not a midnight plunderer. He was a man who had been in office, who had been turned out of office, and who complained that injustice had been done him. And I am told that he was a man of unsound mind.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I wish to know if there was not a clerk in the post office in this city who rifled letters to the amount of several thousand dollars, and who never was brought to justice? and I desire to know if the Government is not aware that of the valuable documents sent out by members through the mails, not one fourth of them ever reach their destination?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am unable to answer questions of this sort. If the gentleman knows of such a case, why does not he institute a prosecution against the offender? If he knows of such a case, why does he not promulgate it, and not do as gentlemen are in the habit of doing, come here with insinuations and questions? I hold that it is highly improper for gentlemen to use their official place here to make charges upon persons in high official position, which they do not substantiate by a single fact.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I will give the gentleman authority in this case. I will refer him to the postmaster of this city.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. For what?

Mr. BURROUGHS. The charges I have just made.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know what the charge is.

Mr. BURROUGHS. That a clerk in the post office in this city robbed letters to the amount of several thousand dollars, and was never brought to justice.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have heard of a case, and suppose it is the one to which the gentleman refers. He was held to bail to answer the charge at a proper day. If the gentleman lives in a country where better can be done than that, I desire specially to commend the favorable condition of his section of the country to the notice of the country at large.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me come to the point. Should this auxiliary guard be authorized? And if so, who is to appoint them? Not the Mayor; for he is a party man. Shall it be the President of the United States? No, not he. High as his position is, he, too, is a party man. Who, then, shall it be? They propose to organize a no-party board, if such an anomaly can be found in these days of political agitation. And to arrive at such a result they propose to have elected a board, composed of two Democrats and two Know Nothings. I am told that the Black Republicans are not to have even a representation.

Mr. CURTIS. We do not ask for any.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Perhaps the gentleman knows his men; of that I do not know; but how long is this board to continue in office? Perhaps its members may alter their political opinions, and the equilibrium of this high court may be disturbed. How is the evil to be corrected? You can only remove the members of this board by law. Will gentlemen, then, come here with the grave charge that such a member of the board of commissioners is no longer a Democrat or an American, and he must therefore be removed?

But how, then, will they act when they are organized, and the question of appointments comes up? One may say the appointee shall be a Democrat, and another that he shall be an American. They are equally divided, and they can make no appointments whatever.

But the gentleman from Ohio who last spoke [Mr. STANTON] does not want the appointing power to be vested in the President, the highest functionary of the Government—one who has passed before the whole nation, who has received a heavy majority of the electoral vote, and who is no longer a candidate for reelection; who is closing his career, and who could have no possible personal motive for any other than upright and proper conduct. But the gentleman is not willing to take such a man; and he gives us reasons. He says he has appointed to office murderers and robbers of his fellow-citizens in the far-away Territory of Kansas. And he gives the case of Mr. Emory, who, under indictment, as I suppose, for murder in Kansas, was appointed to a land office there by the President of the United States. Is that a crime? Is indictment by the Black Republicans any evidence of the guilt of the party indicted? [Laughter.] Would such an indictment in that wild section of the Union create even a suspicion against the party indicted?

Mr. MAYNARD. I was about to make a question of order upon the gentleman from Ohio, but I prefer to make it upon my friend from Virginia, as I know he will not misinterpret the reason of my doing so. It is this; that reference to Kansas and Kansas affairs in this debate is not in order, not being germane to the subject under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the question of order is well taken; that the special order being under consideration, debate should be confined to the subject.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Allow me to submit this remark: I do not desire, of course, to raise any question with the Chair; but here in this bill is raised the question who shall be the appointing power of this auxiliary guard? The gentleman from Ohio argues against vesting it in the President for the reason he has stated. I am arguing in favor of it for the reasons I was proceeding to state; and it does seem to me that such remarks should not be ruled out of order, because it would be depriving me of some arguments bearing directly and necessarily upon the question.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON], if I remember rightly, voted for the admission of Kansas into the Federal Union under the Topeka constitution. That, I suppose, he will admit; and he rejoices in the fullness of his delight in having done so. I shall not advert to the fact that the Topeka constitution is among the things that were; and that another inauguration has taken place of a new and highly delightful character, and which will bring more joy to him than upon the former occasion; and he will have a chance, perhaps, to vote for a constitution in which free negro suffrage is recognized as a proper voting power. Let that pass, however.

The gentleman voted for the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution. In doing that he knew perfectly well that a certain Mr. Robinson would be the Governor of that State. Does the gentleman know who he was voting for to make Governor? I know. He was a gentleman who was in California; a gentleman who resisted the civil authorities there; a gentleman who raised the squatters against the recognized authorities of the city of Sacramento, and with murderous hands slew the sheriff in the lawful exercise of his authority. Does the gentleman know that ultimately this same new Governor of Kansas, or who he was desirous of making such, was indicted, and imprisoned in the prison brig in the Sacramento river; that he was elected by the squatters to a seat in the Legislature; that he was released on giving bonds that he would return to answer the indictment; but that, after serving through the Legislature, he forgot his bonds, and fled to the Atlantic States, and was next heard of in Kansas doing works of mischief? That is the sort of a man he wants to make Governor of Kansas, when he will not trust the President with the appointment of an auxiliary guard for the city of Washington.

Mr. STANTON. I would state that I voted for the admission of Kansas upon the pure principle of squatter sovereignty—the principle that the people shall elect their own officers. I did not know Governor Robinson at all. He suited them, and they suited me.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. You knew what sort of a man suited them, and you voted for him. But that is not all. In giving that vote, the gentleman knew it would be the introduction into the Senate of the United States of a man who was a leader in all the mischief, disorder, burnings, and murders in Kansas for the last two years, and who was driven from the Senate of the United States by a distinguished and eminent Senator, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who denounced him as guilty of the crimes of forgery and perjury.

Mr. STANTON. I presume the gentleman means Sheriff Jones. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I was speaking of one who would be a Senator of the United States. He knew I was speaking of James H. Lane.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will stop here to please the gentleman from New York.

The question recurs, who shall be the appointing power? I beg leave to read to the gentleman from Ohio, who is generally a very dispassionate man, and who is in the habit of dealing in facts, an extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court in a celebrated case arising out of the Dorr rebellion. But before reading it, I will remark that the gentleman from Ohio, in speaking of parties, said he would not give the appointing power to one party or the other, because either party would act upon the principle that to the victors belong the spoils. But the country is divided into political parties, and the appointing power must be lodged somewhere.

But upon this question I will not enlarge. I read from the seventh volume of Howard's Reports some remarks of Judge Nelson, in the Dorr case, made when the Federal court was in the full enjoyment of the highest confidence of the entire country. He said:

"It is said that this power in the President is dangerous to liberty, and may be abused."

That was the great power recognizing the sovereign authority of a State. It was not a little, petty matter like this, but the power of deciding which of the parties of a State was the true popular sovereignty of the State. He says:

"It is said that this power in the President is dangerous to liberty, and may be abused. All power may be abused if placed in unworthy hands. But it would be difficult, we think, to point out any other frauds in which this power would be more safe, and at the same time equally effectual. When citizens of the same State are in arms against each other, and the constituted authorities unable to execute the laws, the interposition of the United States must be prompt, or it is of little value. The ordinary course of proceedings in courts of justice would be utterly unfit for the crisis. And the elevated office of the President, chosen as he is by the people of the United States, and the high responsibility he could not fail to feel when acting in a case of so much moment, appear to furnish as strong safeguards against a willful abuse of power as human prudence and foresight could well provide. At all events, it is conferred upon him by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and must therefore be respected and enforced in its judicial tribunals."

Such, sir, was the language of the Supreme Court, in reference to a great matter; and shall that argument not be regarded as having effect and value, in reference to a little matter of this description? It does seem to me most remarkable that here, in a District within our exclusive jurisdiction; here in a District where the population is fleeing and unsettled, and where, consequently, the people cannot contribute to the full extent requisite for an efficient police, we, the Representatives of the people, interested for our own personal safety, and for the safety of those whom our presence brings here on business, are unwilling to create a proper and sufficient police for the purpose of keeping down the rowdies and others who come from adjoining cities for the advantage of the harvest which they expect to reap here from the concentration of Federal authority on this point. I ask, gentlemen, if it be possible that we can pause or hesitate to do what may secure that safety to which we are entitled, because a partisan has to make the appointments? In whom can the power rest with so much safety as in the hands of one who has been elevated to the highest position in the world by the voices of his countrymen, and who has now nothing to seek but their affection and regard?

Mr. MAYNARD obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being Senate bill "to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject;" and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a memorial addressed to myself by a committee appointed by the citizens of that portion of the Territory of Utah which is situated west of Goose Creek range of mountains, commonly known as Carson Valley, in favor of the establishment of a territorial government over them, and containing the request that I should communicate it to Congress. I have received but one copy of this memorial, which I transmit to the House upon the suggestion of James M. Crane, Esq., Delegate elect from the people composing the new Territory, for the reason, as he alleges, that the subject is now under consideration before the Committee on Territories of that body. JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, April 13th, 1858.

The message was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSES IN THE NORTHWEST.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Treasury Department in answer to the resolution of the House in regard to light-house expenses on the northwestern lakes, in the tenth and eleventh districts.

On motion of Mr. COMINS, the communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARY IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the memorial of the Legislature of Kansas, asking an appropriation for a penitentiary in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

ATLANTIC STEAM FERRY COMPANY.

Mr. GARNETT asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Atlantic Steam Ferry Company, incorporated by the General Assembly of Virginia, on the 15th March, 1856, to build, or purchase, in any foreign country, such vessels as said company may require, said vessels to be entitled to all the privileges of navigation and otherwise, to which vessels built in the United States are, or shall be entitled.

Mr. CAMPBELL objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, (at thirteen minutes after four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 14, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Eliphalet Lyman, praying to be allowed bounty land for his services as surgeon to a company of drafted militia in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial of citizens of Boston, remonstrating against the repeal of the act establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of J. Hosford Smith, praying for an additional allowance during the time he was United States consul at Beirut in Syria; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TOOMBS presented two petitions of citizens of the city of New York, praying for the enactment of a general relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Edson Fessenden, praying for the renewal of his patent for a power-weaving loom; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. KING presented the petition of James Smith, praying to be allowed a pension for an injury received while a soldier in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of owners of property in squares Nos. 687 and 688, situated north and south of the East Park of the Capitol, praying Congress to come to some decision in regard to the enlargement of the Capitol grounds, during the present session; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

RESOLUTIONS FROM CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BRODERICK presented resolutions of the Legislature of California in favor of an act of Congress granting to that State five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in California for school purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a communication from Andrew J. Moulder, superintendent of public instruction in California, relative to the sale of public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to land titles in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of a weekly mail route in certain counties in that State, and the location of certain post offices therein; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of a weekly mail from Weaverville, via the mouth of Cañon Creek, to Cañon City, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GWIN. I am requested to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of California, relative to the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State under the Lecompton constitution. I ask that they be read; and as the subject has been disposed of by the Senate, I move that they be printed, and laid on the table.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Concurrent resolution relative to the admission of Kansas.

Whereas, The people of the Territory of Kansas did, on the 7th day of November, 1857, by a convention assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government so formed is republican; and whereas, the said constitution has been submitted to the Congress of the United States with the view of the admission of Kansas into the Union as an independent State: Therefore,

Resolved by the Assembly, (the Senate concurring,) That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote for the immediate admission of the Territory of Kansas into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

Resolved, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

N. E. WHITESIDES,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOSEPH WALKUP,
President of the Senate.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA, March 19, 1858.

I, Ferris Forman, Secretary of State of the State of California, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true and correct copy of a concurrent resolution, relative to the admission of Kansas, now on file in this office.

Witness my hand, and the great seal of State, at the office in Sacramento, California, the 19th day of [1858] March, A. D. 1858.

FERRIS FORMAN,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BRODERICK. The resolutions introduced by my colleague, from the Legislature of California, will have no influence upon my action here, now or in the future. I am satisfied that these resolutions do not express the opinions of the people of California upon the question to which they refer. I am satisfied, sir, that four fifths of the people of California repudiate the Lecompton fraud. I shall respect the wishes of the people, and pay no respect to the resolutions passed by a Legislature not representing the opinions of the people of California. I merely say this now for the purpose of placing myself right on the record.

Mr. GWIN. I do not intend to discuss this question, as it has passed from the consideration of the Senate. I take issue with the Senator in his statement as to the public sentiment in California on this subject, and accept the tribunal he invokes—the people. Before that great tribunal I am willing to be present myself, and abide its decision, having no doubt or fear of the result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the printing of the resolutions.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have no objection to the printing.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL FROM UTAH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a memorial from a number of persons representing themselves to be a committee on behalf of the citizens of Great Salt Lake City, accompanied by a preamble and resolutions adopted by a meeting of the citizens of that city.

Mr. BIGLER. The paper which the President has just presented from Utah, I learn is a memorial, accompanied by a preamble and resolutions, which embody a very significant expression of the views and purposes of that peculiar set of people. I think, sir, it would be highly proper to have the preamble and resolutions read. They are especially interesting at this time, as the Senate, probably, in a few hours will be considering the deficiency bill, on which we shall have to debate the policy of this expedition.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolutions accompanying the memorial of the inhabitants of Great Salt Lake City to the President and Congress of the United States, as follows:

Whereas, in the year 1833, the military of the county of Jackson, State of Missouri, under the command of the Lieutenant Governor thereof, did expel our people from their homes, many of whom were murdered by them, their property destroyed, and their families driven and scattered; others were whipped, tarred and feathered, and a few others barbarously treated by and under the immediate direction of the military and civil authorities; and whereas, in the year 1838, the Executive of Missouri did order out an overwhelming military force, march them into our settlements and butcher many, without regard to either age, sex, or condition; robbed us of our property, imprisoned many of our brethren without process, ravished our wives and daughters, and drove us off, under a brutal order of extermination, from land we had purchased from the General Government; and whereas, the Executive of the sovereign State of Illinois, in violation of all law, did march a military force into our neighborhood, and under the most solemn pledge of protection and legal justice, compel our leading men to deliver themselves into his hands, he himself acknowledging that they were not guilty of any crime, leaving them in the power of assassins, who did treacherously and inhumanly butcher them; and whereas, the State of Illinois, in 1845, did require our people, under pain of extermination by an infuriated mob, to leave the State, pledging themselves to protect us in doing so, yet suffered our people to be murdered and our houses burned with impunity; and whereas, we did petition the Chief Executive of our nation, and the Governor of each State and Territory in the Union, for an asylum from our persecutors, where we could enjoy our religion unmolested, which only met with insult and cold neglect; and whereas, when we were fleeing into the wilderness, a call was made by the General Government on us for five hundred of our most efficient men, who were readily furnished, and who went in the service of our country, which was then engaged in a war with the Republic of Mexico; and whereas, as soon as our most efficient men had left in the service of our country, the State of Illinois marched a formidable army to Nauvoo, where many of the infirm and aged fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters of those very men engaged in the war with Mexico, were killed and wounded, forcing the families that were left destitute to the desolate prairies, a prey to hunger, cold, and disease; and whereas, on our journey here we were compelled to make a temporary location for winter quarters on the west bank of the Missouri river, near Council Bluffs, to which the Government of the United States sent their officers, and notified us to vacate our houses notwithstanding many of those who occupied them were the families of those very men engaged in the service of the United States in the war with Mexico, and who themselves were discharged two thousand miles from their families, in an enemy's country, without the means of returning home; and whereas, we have wandered under the protection of the Almighty, and the wise counsel of our worthy Governor, Brigham Young, fourteen hundred miles into the desert, making our own roads, and leaving our persecutors to the enjoyment of our hard-earned labors; and whereas, not a solitary individual who has participated in any of the murders, robberies, rapes, and other enormities inflicted upon us within the United States, has ever been brought to justice; and whereas, our repeated petitions for redress to those in authority have been answered by adding insult to injury; and whereas, the people of this Territory have been peaceful and law abiding, living in the strict observance of the laws of the United States applicable in our Territory; and whereas, the Government of the United States, as is reported, has sent a formidable army into our Territory:

Resolved, That we regard the movements of the present Administration, in sending their armed legions into our midst, as a renewal of the persecution, butcheries, and horrid scenes of destruction with which their eyes were gloated while we were in their midst.

Resolved, That we highly approve of the constitutional, patriotic, and humane course pursued by his Excellency Governor Brigham Young, in taking efficient measures to intercept the progress of these unwelcome, unasked, and corrupting intruders.

Resolved, That we fully approve of the resolutions passed in the Legislative Assembly, indorsing and approving the acts of the Governor in relation to the invading army, and we heartily concur in the spirit and sentiments expressed in the memorial adopted by the Legislative Assembly, January 6, 1858.

Resolved, That no officer appointed by the Administration shall exercise any dominion over us while their armies are menacing our territory.

Resolved, That we would be recreant to every principle of honor, patriotism, virtue, integrity, self respect, and common decency, should we tamely submit, like the menial serfs of Russia, to be ruled by the bayonet.

Resolved, That we tender to his Excellency Governor Young our utmost exertions, our lives, and our fortunes, for the defense of our rights; that we regard no sacrifice too great, and are ready, if necessary, to sacrifice our homes, but we will not see them inherited by our enemies.

Resolved, That we request the Government of the United States to withdraw their armed menials and cease to prostitute the executive power of a great nation to subvert the ends of cruelty, religious oppression, and injustice.

Resolved, That as, in all our persecutions and sufferings, heretofore, we have been deceived by promises of protection and pretenses of enforcing the law, we will not suffer ourselves to be again deceived by such shallow pretenses, and that if the authorities of the United States wish to convince us of their lawful, humane, and just intentions to us as a people, they must pay us our damages, redress our wrongs, punish our murderers, plunderers, and ravishers, or we shall continue to believe that they have not reformed.

Resolved, That we appeal to the native justice of the people of the United States, our brothers, our kindred, whose fathers fought side by side with ours the battles of our country's independence, and whose blood mingled together, a sacrifice to purchase civil and religious liberty; we have been reared at the same firesides, educated at the same schools, colleges, and universities, and we are entitled to all the privileges of religious liberty, purchased by the common suffering of our fathers; to you we appeal to stretch forth the hand and save these principles from the vile attempt of unprincipled demagogues to crush and submerge them in the blood of your fellow countrymen.

Resolved, That we deprecate and deeply deplore the causeless, but overwhelming prejudice which denied even the presentation of our constitution and application for admission into the Union as a State; and also, the subsequent attempts of the Government to crush the people of this Territory by depriving them of every vestige of constitutional right and liberty.

Resolved, That our religion inculcates morality, a strict observance of social ties, a lasting interest in the welfare of all good men, and respect to the rights of others in the same degree as we would have our own respected.

Resolved, That by the help of Almighty God, we will maintain our constitutional rights and liberties, our religion, our wives and children, and our hard earned firesides and homes, and we invite the down trodden and oppressed of all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, of whatever faith they may be, together, to these valleys, where they can worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Salt Lake county, Utah Territory.

GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, January 16, 1858.

Mr. POLK. I feel it due, sir, to the State which I in part represent, not to allow the paper which has just been read to pass unchallenged in regard to the statements it makes as to the conduct of the Missourians towards that people while they were in that State. I shall briefly say, only, that those charges I consider slanderous and false. They were allowed to remain in Missouri just so long as they could be tolerated in a civilized community governed by law and regulated by proper moral sentiment. So long as life and property could be held safe to such an extent that anything like a sure tenure of either could be relied on by the population, that people were allowed to remain there. They were ultimately driven off, and driven off because the execution of the law required that they should leave the communities in which they were placed. When they were finally expelled from the State, I undertake to say, for I have had a representation of the facts from a gentleman who is now a distinguished member of the other House of Congress, who commanded the forces of Missouri at the time, that there was no cruelty practiced upon that people. They were compelled to surrender; and when they did surrender, the offenders against whom legal process had been issued, and was in the hands of public officers, but which could not be served before because the parties were shielded from arrest by the illegal combinations of that people, were delivered into the hands of justice, to be disposed of by the civil tribunals. They had a fair trial, and no rights of theirs, either of person or of property, I believe, were wantonly or unjustly invaded or trampled upon by Missouri as a State, or by Missourians as individuals. They left Missouri and went to Illinois. Illinois received them at first with open arms; but after being there a while, they became intolerable, so that they could be borne there no longer; and ultimately, I believe, they were compelled to leave that State. The security of the citizens of that State required that they should depart. They have departed; and now that they are in rebellion, as I consider it, at Great Salt Lake, they are adding insult to the treachery and treason which they are at this very moment exhibiting by their conduct against the United States; insult to Missouri and to Illinois, and to the whole United States, of which those two States are constituent members.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was not in the Chamber when that paper was laid before the Senate. I heard only the conclusion of it. I do not feel myself under the same obligation that the Senator from Missouri did, to enter any protests against their statements. I have no apprehension that any statements of Brigham Young, or of that community at Salt Lake, will disparage the character of the State of Illinois, or of the State of Missouri, or of any other State in the Union. History will do justice to our two States—Missouri and Illinois. It has done it, in fact, already. The public sentiment of those States, of the Union, and of the world, has vindicated them. If any further vindication was necessary, it would be found in the action of these people at Salt Lake, in the tone of the concluding part of that memorial, or protest, or whatever it may be called. It is in terms and in spirit a declaration of war, appealing to all mankind against the American Government and the American people; showing themselves to be alien enemies, not entitled to the protection of the United States. The very character of that paper carries with it a sufficient shield to protect the Illinoisians and the Missourians, or the citizens of any other State they may slander, from the denunciations and charges they make. Sir, I have no defense to make of my State. She needs none. Missouri can rest upon her history; Illinois upon hers; and let the future dispose of these people at Salt Lake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition will the Senate make of the communication which has been laid before it?

Mr. GWIN. I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope it will be referred. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. GWIN. I withdraw my motion, if the gentleman wishes it; and move to refer this communication to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have a word to say on that. I think it is showing too much respect to a paper of that description to refer it, for the purpose of having a report; and I think the original motion of the Senator from California was the proper one, to lay it on the table. The subject-matter, in proper, respectful terms, is before the committee now; and I think it is showing too much respect to a paper of that description to refer it to the committee. It is a war measure, if anything, and should go to the Committee on Military Affairs; but I would not propose its reference anywhere.

Mr. GWIN. I renew my motion to lay the paper on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish the honorable Senator from Illinois would reconsider that subject for a moment. These people, I think, are entitled to very little respect, and to no sympathy. But let us reflect. We are informed by the President of the United States that all civil authority, all the functions of the Federal Government, in Utah, are suspended, overthrown by the action of this people. We know that there is an armed force on its way to compel them to submit and to acknowledge the authority of the United States. The paper which they have sent here, of which I have heard but a small portion, I suppose was intended to have the character of a petition, or, at least, of a protest; and it must be expected that a people with whom such relations are existing, or such want of relations as is existing between them and the United States, would not be very careful or very guarded in their language, and that they would not express themselves with the respect and consideration for the feelings of the Government of the United States, or those connected with it, that might be expected if they stood in different relations.

We are striking these people, as I understand it; and I think it is but just and generous and wise to hear them. To lay their petition upon the table would be construed by them into contempt. It does not become us to practice contempt of the weak, especially if they are subjects of our own jurisdiction. But it seems to me, that, waiving all objections to the character and temper of the paper, it would be wise to give it a reference; and, of all the references, that which is most appropriate is to the Committee on Territories. I see an allusion in it—a complaint—that their application to be admitted into the Union has not been considered. That is a complaint against the Government of the United States which it is proper for that committee to examine. I therefore think it would be much wiser and better to refer this petition to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BIGLER. When I called for the reading of this paper, I intimated that after its reading it should be committed, and I intended to make that motion; but having heard the extraordinary sentiments which it contains, and the offensive language in which those sentiments are expressed, broad accusations against two sovereign States, and the individual citizens of those States, accusing them of crimes the most offensive and horrible, attributing to the United States Government and the people of the United States, injustice of purpose and oppression, I felt like concurring in the proposition of the Senator from California, and I shall most certainly go for that motion, if it is to signify the sense of the Senate, as intimated by the Senator from Illinois. If that is to be the interpretation of the vote which we are about to give, then I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from California; and in so doing I give a vote of contempt for sentiments that are offensive to the people and to the Government of the United States, and for the menace which this paper makes. I think we ought to adopt the motion of the Senator from California, and lay this paper on the table as not such a one as ought to be referred to a committee and considered seriously.

Mr. DOUGLAS. One word more, and in reply to the Senator from New York—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. I believe the motion is to lay on the table, and that is not debatable. I will not make the question of order on the Senator from Illinois now, but I give notice to the next gentleman who commences to speak on this subject after him, that I will interpose so as to stop this discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was not going to argue the question, but simply to state a fact. I understand that the President has deemed it wise and prudent, under the circumstances, to send a commission to Salt Lake to confer and report upon the state of things there. If that be the case, I should not deem it proper for the committee to report here until we hear from that commission; and I think, therefore, it would not be wise to refer this matter to a committee, (because a reference implies a report,) until we hear from that commission; and then we shall know what views the Administration have upon the subject; and those views will be founded upon official information. The appointment of a commission implies that they are not satisfied with the rumors and character of the information we now have upon the subject. That implication is conclusive; otherwise, they would not have sent for further information. They have sent men of distinction and national reputation to inquire, perhaps to negotiate, at least to report on the facts. I should think, therefore, it would be proper to lay this paper on the table, and not refer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator from Illinois that this is a privileged motion, and debate is out of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad it is, as I have said all that I intended to say.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I understand the Chair to say that this is not subject to debate; but I wish to make a single observation. I have not heard this paper read, but I think it would be best to pursue the usual course. It is for our interest, not theirs, that I would prefer to have the matter referred.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not hear the memorial, and must excuse myself from voting.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson, of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Summons, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—17.

So the paper was ordered to lie on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. YULEE. On the 25th of January last, the Secretary of War sent to the Senate a communication, transmitting estimates for the pay of volunteers serving in Florida, during the present fiscal year. The communication should have been sent to the Committee on Finance, but it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that the Military Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the papers relating to the claim of Daniel S. Ryan and Benjamin C. Wyley, administrators of R. D. Rowland and of James M. Crook, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 262) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Richard D. Rowland, deceased. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Miller, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate directing an inquiry into the expediency of abolishing the military asylum near Washington city, and of providing some other means of support for the inmates, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the select committee on the military asylum; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey relative to the erection of a custom-house and post office at Trenton, and a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa respecting a marine hospital, custom-house, and post office at Muscatine, in Iowa, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 208) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of William Cruickshank and others, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of William Cruickshank, J. S. Black, Calhoun Benham, and Frederick A. Sawyer, of San Francisco. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Michael Nash, reported a bill (S. No. 261) for the relief of Michael Nash, of the District of Columbia; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to take up the resolution passed by the House of Representatives fixing the day for the adjournment of Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on the first Monday of June next, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move its adoption.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia that this resolution had better lie over a while, until we see what progress we make in the public business, and see whether we shall be able to get through with the appropriation bills by that time. I think that probably by next week we shall be able to form some judgment as to whether we can adjourn at so early a day. I, for one, should be unwilling to act now. I am as anxious to get away as the Senator from Georgia can be; but I think we are not able to decide it at the present.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not think the reasons of my friend from Virginia are sufficient. The resolution gives Congress more than six weeks longer. The appropriation bills are all here. We can do the business as easily within six weeks as six months. We rarely address ourselves to the task of selecting the business that ought to pass until we fix the day of adjournment. I think the resolution allows ample time. I see no difficulty in the state of the public business; I do not think the gentleman can point out any. I believe, too, that the public are right in their expectations that this Congress was, at least, to relieve the public after passing the new compensation law, by adjourning at an early day, and getting through with a large portion of the business of the country at a seasonable time. We have nothing to do but to pass the appropriation bills, and settle a few other questions of internal policy. The Pacific railroad bill is before us, and we were near taking a vote on it yesterday; we can take it in a few days. I know of no public business which this branch of Congress cannot dispose of in six weeks, as well as in six months.

Mr. HUNTER. There are very few of the appropriation bills yet acted on in the Senate, and there are several of the most important to be acted on in the other House. I think we shall be better able to judge of this matter after the Kansas question shall be disposed of, and I suppose it will be settled within the week.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What else have you to do?

Mr. HUNTER. We have only acted here on two or three of the most unimportant of the general appropriation bills that they have sent us. The Indian bill we have received, and one branch of the old civil and diplomatic bill. That now is sent in three separate bills. We have had only the first, which I shall ask the Senate to take up to-day. We have not had the general bills appropriating for the Army or Navy. All these bills are behind us yet.

Mr. IVERSON. I cannot, myself, consent to vote for this resolution to adjourn on the 7th of June, and I will proceed very briefly to give the reasons why I am opposed to it. I do not believe that the two Houses can perform the ordinary amount of public business within the time prescribed; and if we adjourn on the 7th of June, we shall adjourn with a very large amount of necessary and important public business undone.

Now, sir, the ordinary time of adjournment heretofore, at the long session, has been in August or September. I believe at no session within the last six or eight years has Congress adjourned before August. Two years ago, we adjourned on the 14th of August, and the sessions have run into September. If we adjourn in the beginning of June, two months before the ordinary period of adjournment, and leave much public business untransacted, as must necessarily be left, we shall get the imputation, and deservedly, in my opinion, from all parts of the United States, of adjourning at an early day because we have salaries for our services, and not daily pay. I am not willing to subject myself, or the Senate, or the House of Representatives, to any such imputation. The imputation will be that members of Congress, receiving salaries, and desiring to abandon public business, adjourned at an early day; and I think there will be some cause for this imputation. At any rate, I am willing to sit here longer, even at an expense of time and money, rather than be subjected to any such imputation. I think it is the duty of Congress to sit until the public business is disposed of.

Now, sir, look at the appropriation bills. As the Senator from Virginia has said, there is not a solitary important appropriation bill that has yet received the action of the House of Representatives. The Army bill, the Navy bill, the civil and diplomatic bills, and the omnibus bill, have none of them as yet received the action of the House of Representatives. They have to go through that body, and come here, and we know that the cacoethis loquendi exists in this body to such an extent, without any rules to cut it off, that from that cause alone you will not get through business as early as my colleague anticipates. It is all a mistake. If you sat here eight or ten hours a day, and sat every day in the week, probably you might transact most of the business; but is it expected that Senators will do that? Are you going to work yourselves like pack-horses in order to get through by the 1st of June? No, sir; it is better to do business decently, leisurely, and in order, and take a little more time. I will move an amendment to the resolution, if it is to be pressed now, to strike out "June," and insert "July."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the special order.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the special order will not be postponed.

Mr. HALE. I understand that this is a privileged question.

Mr. BRODERICK. My colleague is not in his seat. He will be here in a few moments.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to those who called up the resolution, to postpone its consideration to Monday next; because some will vote against it if you act now, who might vote with you on Monday next.

Mr. TOOMBS. I cannot see any reason for a postponement. Gentlemen must vote as they think proper. In my opinion, it is very proper to pass the resolution; I think the public interest demands it. I am perfectly willing to take the vote myself; of course, Senators will vote as they please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is always a privileged question; but the Chair has doubts whether a motion to fix the day of adjournment is a privileged question.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to postpone all previous orders, for the purpose of disposing of this resolution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose this takes precedence over any special order, being a question of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks a motion to fix the day of adjournment is not a privileged question.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of continuing this matter.

Mr. GWIN. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I want to inquire how the Senator from California had the floor? I was recognized; the Chair interrupted me, but I had not yielded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. My motion is to postpone all previous orders, for the purpose of disposing of this resolution.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Simmons, Sidel, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Mallory, Seward, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—15.

So the motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is now before the Senate.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to strike out "June," and insert "July."

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not propose to change the day; we do not know that we shall need be here until July. I hope we may get away in June, but I fear we shall not be able to do so. I shall not vote to tie the hands of the Senate, and therefore I shall vote against the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The question now is on the passage of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If it does not pass it is disposed of finally.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the end of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then we are in this condition: we must either take the day fixed by the House of Representatives, or have no resolution pending to act upon at all. ["Yes."] I am for adjourning some time.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 39, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Sidel, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bright, Brown, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, Mallory, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—12.

So the resolution was concurred in.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. We had the bill under consideration last week, and we ought to conclude it. I think it will not take all day. I move to postpone all prior orders for that purpose.

Mr. GWIN. That bill was passed to a third reading, and it can be taken up in the morning hour to-morrow morning. The Pacific railroad bill has been postponed from day to day. The Senator knows perfectly well that his appropriation bill is not pressing, and he can pass it in the morning hour any day.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] had it laid over, and his purpose is to offer an amendment.

Mr. GWIN. He is not in his seat.

Mr. HUNTER. He is here in the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Virginia will let us go on with the special order.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senate has just agreed to adjourn in June, and we certainly cannot do it unless we go on with the appropriation bills. I must move to take it up. I shall hurry it through as fast as I can.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senator from Virginia has no idea of interfering with the Pacific railroad bill. That ought to be disposed of. I call for the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. HUNTER. I submit the motion to postpone all prior orders, and take up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill will not be postponed. It has been before the Senate some half a dozen times within the last two weeks. It appears that it is to be disposed of in this way in a minute; it takes no time at all to dispose of it. If it is the intention of the Senate to vote it down, they had better signify their wish by meeting it at once and disposing of the question. I consider it a very important measure—the most important ever introduced into this Chamber. If the Senate see fit to cast it off from day to day to take up a bill for paying our consuls abroad, they can do it if there is a majority on the floor for it; but I hope, if this bill is to be considered at all, it will be considered to-day, for it is one of vital importance to the people of California. But, sir, there appears to be a disposition to treat this bill with no seriousness at all. I hope my colleague will insist on the consideration of his bill to-day.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to make a remark as to the ground of the vote I am going to give. So far as the appropriation bills are concerned, they always get through Congress. I never knew one to fail. They will get through some how or other. The chairman of the Committee on Finance I know, has great solicitude for the appropriation bills, and has the public interests much at heart. I will go with him as far as anybody in expediting and pushing his bills forward; but my little experience in deliberative bodies satisfies me that the fastest and best way to get along with the public business is to take it in the order in which it comes. Here is the Pacific railroad bill; let us take it up and dispose of it. Here are other special orders; let us take them up and dispose of them. I have been anxiously waiting from day to day hoping that things would progress in their proper order so that we might reach what I conceive to be the most important measure of this or any other session of Congress, that is the homestead bill. I am in hopes we shall go on regularly and take up the business as it stands on the Calendar, and then we shall advance much more rapidly, and I think much more satisfactorily to the country.

Mr. COLLAMER. What is the form of the motion before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To postpone all previous orders, and take up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Clay, Collamer, Dixon, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, King, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, Wade, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Crittenden, Doolittle, Douglas, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Harlan, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is now before the Senate, being the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service by railroad from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the bill in the tenth section, sixteenth line, by inserting after the word "yard" these words: "or such other track as the President shall decide to be equivalent thereto in strength and security," so that the clause will read:

With rails of the best quality weighing not less than seventy-five pounds to the yard, or such other track as the President shall decide to be equivalent thereto in strength and security.

Mr. GREEN. I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry of the Presiding Officer. This amendment is proposed to the tenth section. I desire to propose an amendment to the first section, and I wish to know whether I shall be precluded if this action be taken first?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Senator from Missouri will not be precluded from offering his amendment, though it is more regular to proceed section by section from the beginning.

Mr. FOSTER. I have received a memorial from a constituent of mine since the bill was reported, and therefore there was no appropriate committee to which to refer it; and as it is very short, I ask that it may be read at the Clerk's table. It will explain my reasons for moving this amendment.

The Clerk read it as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Timothy Dwight, of the city of New Haven, and State of Connecticut, respectfully sheweth:

That in the bill reported to the Senate by the special committee on the Pacific railroad, it is provided, in section ten, that said railroad shall be built with rails weighing not less than seventy-five pounds to the yard.

That your memorialist has invented, and obtained letters patent for, an improvement in rails for railways, which, beside many other important advantages, is superior in strength of track, and freedom from liability to accidents, to the best railroads now in use in the United States, and is fully equal, at a greatly diminished expense, to the track specified in the bill above mentioned.

That the plan has been submitted to many distinguished engineers and others connected with the construction and management of railways, and has been fully approved by them; of which fact he is prepared to exhibit the evidence to your honorable body.

That in his plan the use of a rail weighing seventy-five pounds to the yard is unnecessary; and that, if the provision requiring its use is retained in the bill referred to, it will prevent the use of a practically better track thus invented and patented by your memorialist, and thus cause an unnecessary expenditure of several millions of dollars in the construction of a Pacific railroad, besides causing great and irreparable injury to your memorialist.

Your memorialist does not ask your honorable body to sanction the use of the track invented by him, or to decide upon its merits; but he believes it to be obviously expedient, as well as an act of simple justice to himself, that it should be examined by a competent board, and that until thus examined its adoption should not be prohibited by law.

He therefore prays that the bill may be amended by inserting after the words "seventy-five pounds to the yard," "or such other track as the President shall decide to be equivalent thereto in strength and security," or in such other manner as may accomplish the object of this memorial, and afford adequate relief.

TIMOTHY DWIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President—

Mr. GWIN. The Senator will permit me to suggest to him that I think he had better withdraw his amendment at present, and let us commence at the beginning, because it may not meet with the favorable consideration of the Senate when first presented. After we have examined that paper, perhaps there will be no objection to it. Let us go through the bill section by section, and when we get to this section, it is more than probable that the communication which has been read, which will be published in the Globe, will remove all objection to this amendment. At present there are Senators on this side who are not prepared to vote for it.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my amendment, upon the suggestion of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest, as he has already done, that it is more regular to proceed section by section, beginning with the first section, and if no amendment be offered to it, then to take up the second section, and so on. The Chair will entertain propositions to amend the first or second section, in preference to one for an amendment of other sections.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to move an amendment to the first section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I prefer that the course suggested by the Chair should be taken. Let the bill be read section by section, and then let any gentleman offer any amendment.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enter into a contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad, from a point on the Missouri river between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers, to San Francisco, in the State of California, on the most eligible route, reference being had to feasibility, shortness, and economy.

Mr. GREEN. I move to amend the first section by striking out, commencing in the seventh line, and ending in the eighth, the following words: "a point on the Missouri river between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers," and inserting "the mouth of the Kansas river." The object of making the motion is to fix the point definitely by act of Congress rather than to leave it uncertain, depending either upon the contractors or upon the executive department. I prefer that the responsibility should be taken by Congress itself. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to take that responsibility, not to transfer it to the executive department, nor even to leave it to the option of the contracting parties. I name the mouth of the Kansas river because it is central to the whole Union; it gives no advantage to the South or to the North, and while it is, as I am free to admit, a benefit to the State of Missouri, yet it results from the peculiar location of Missouri. I am also free to admit that I feel the more anxiety upon that subject because Missouri is my own State. These partialities and prejudices in favor of our own are natural; but while they influence me to that extent, I think disinterested men, looking at this subject with reference to its bearing on the whole Union, will see that if we are to have but one road, this is the only fair point at which it should start on the Missouri river. If you go higher north it is prejudicial to the South; if you go further south it is prejudicial to the North. To fix it at this point is fair, is equal, is just; and when the return trade from the rich shores of the Pacific reaches the mouth of Kansas river, it will radiate to all parts of the Union. Wherever the inducements are best and greatest, there the trade will center. I need not amplify and enlarge upon this proposition. It is plain and simple. The geography of the country is understood by all Senators. Its adaptation to the wants of all sections must strike every one at the first glance; hence I leave it for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I regret that I am constrained to dissent from the proposition of my friend from Missouri. The mouth of the Platte river was originally designated by the committee as the starting point of this road; but inasmuch as there was a diversity of opinion as to whether it should be the mouth of the Platte, or a little above, or a little below; and inasmuch as there were many railroads already in progress across Iowa and across Missouri, which, by a little convergence, would reach the main line, it was thought best, and it was done on my own motion, to strike out "the mouth of the Platte," and insert, "a point between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers." I do not think it would be right now to limit it to the mouth of the Kansas. If we were to limit it to any one point, I should say the mouth of the Platte, which is about half way between these two rivers. But I am willing to leave it as the bill leaves it—the starting point on the Missouri river to be between the mouths of the Big Sioux and the Kansas, and to be selected by the contractors. I am not willing to say that the line shall start from the particular point indicated by the Senator from Missouri. I think we had better leave it as it stands in the bill. I believe it is safer. All these considerations were taken into view by the committee when we agreed upon the language in the bill as it now stands.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to say a few words in accordance with what the Senator from Illinois has said in support of his views. I think, sir, it would be a great injustice to the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, and a still greater one to the State of Minnesota and the new Territory which is soon to be formed, I hope, west of Minnesota, to confine the starting point of the road to the mouth of the Kansas river. As the Senator from Illinois has said, if any point were designated in the bill, perhaps it ought to be the mouth of the Platte, though my opinions are decidedly that the mouth of the Big Sioux is the proper point, if any is to be designated, which is the northern boundary of the State of Iowa. The mouth of the Big Sioux is on the same parallel of latitude with the South Pass. We in the North believe that the road which shall go to the Pacific ocean should run through the South Pass. It is on about the same parallel with Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, Albany, and Boston. The great commerce of the North is upon that line, and always will be, in my opinion; and for that reason I think the road ought not to commence south of the line of the State of Iowa. It ought not to be confined to the State of Missouri. The mouth of the Kansas is within the State of Missouri; the mouth of the Big Sioux is in the Territory of Nebraska. I sincerely hope that the Senate will not adopt the motion of my friend from Missouri. If it does, in my opinion it will be fatal to the bill; at all events it will be injurious to it in a great degree. I do not believe in legislating for localities. I believe in allowing the engineers of the United States and the contractors to have the say as to where this road shall commence and where it shall run.

Mr. BROWN. I believe I shall vote for this amendment, because I am willing to do a clever thing for my friend from Missouri; and I might as well say now what I intend to say on this whole proposition. Under no possible conceivable circumstances am I going to vote for the bill; and yet, sir, I am in favor of a Pacific railroad bill. That is, I am in favor of building a Pacific railroad; and whenever any company shall present itself in any organized position affording sufficient guarantees to justify it, then I am willing to bring the Government up to the aid of that company. If A, B, and C, with their associates, were to come here to-morrow showing that they had organized for the purpose of building a railroad to the Pacific; if, then, D, E, and F, came and showed that they were organized for the same purpose; and still a third company, all showing that they were organized for that purpose, and holding out a reasonable prospect of success—a prospect which satisfied me that they could succeed, with the aid of the Government, then I should be willing to extend that aid. But I am not willing to vote for a bill which is to call these companies into existence, who are to come here on the mere advertisement of the President and put in their proposition, leaving it to his judgment, and not to yours, sir, or to mine, to determine whether they have the capacity to build the road; leaving the President of the United States to enter into contracts, which must finally result in the expenditure of hundreds of millions of the public money, and by possibility, at the end of the expenditure, have no road.

I congratulate our friends on the other side. Some of them, but a few days ago, and their friends in the other House, within the last twenty-four hours, as we see from the official reports, have expressed great distrust of the ability and capacity of the President to appoint a chief of the auxiliary guard in Washington. It is dangerous to trust this immense power in his hands! He is to bring around him a pretorian guard which threatens the very safety of the people and the liberties of the Republic! Now, we have a proposition here to allow the same President to enter into contracts involving the expenditure of tens and hundreds of millions of public money. My friend from Connecticut thinks the powers are not quite large enough, and he brings in a proposition to make them larger. I congratulate our friends; I congratulate the President. It seems that gentlemen of the Opposition believe that a little matter of appointing a chief of the auxiliary guard is below the dignity of the President, below his great mind; but, when it comes to intrusting to him extraordinary discretion, great powers, then they admit the maximum of his intellect, and they are willing to intrust the power.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator from Mississippi will give me a moment, I will say that he cannot certainly mean me by his remark. He alludes to me as one having changed my purpose or views in regard to the question. I voted for the bill introduced by him in regard to an auxiliary guard.

Mr. BROWN. I did not mean that. The Senator thought that the powers in this bill conferred on the President not large enough, and he wanted to enlarge them.

Mr. FOSTER. But at the same time, the Senator alluded to a wonderful change having come over the minds of Senators in regard to the bill for the auxiliary guard for which I voted.

Mr. BROWN. I did not mean that, of course, for the Senator from Connecticut voted for it. Now, I must say, that I am not willing, high as my admiration for the President is, and as much discretion as I should be willing to intrust to him, to give him all that is conceded by this bill. I would not give it to anybody. I can see very clearly that the passage of this bill must drag after it, at a future time, the expenditure of vast treasures. You make this a Government work. You get yourselves so mingled up with it that you cannot separate yourselves from it. And what is to be the consequence? Thus tied on to this work, it will, in the end, absorb the whole politics of the United States; it will be more fruitful of party dissensions and party discords than the Bank of the United States ever was. Presidential elections will turn on it; your State elections, your county elections, all your elections, will have reference to this great railroad scheme, if you get yourselves mixed up with it, in the manner prescribed by this bill.

I say again, sir, that I am in favor of the construction of a railroad—one, two, or three—to the Pacific, and of giving aid, by grants of land, and liberal contracts for transporting the mails; but I want to enter into these contracts with actual existing companies, who have shown an ability to construct their roads. It is thus that you have made grants of land to all roads for which grants have been made heretofore. You had an actual company in existence; you simply gave your assistance; you had no stock in the road; you issued no Government bonds, and had no connection with it, except to give the aid which you give clear to an organized company—one already in existence. There is no such company here. You propose to call a company into existence, through the agency of an advertisement by the President. He is to enter into contracts with them, and to issue Government bonds. The result, in my opinion, will be such as I have indicated. I have no speech to make on this question; I simply desired to indicate the position which I occupy in reference to it, and with that I am content. I shall record my vote against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The pioneer bill of all the great land grants was the Illinois central railroad bill. I refused to bring in the bill for that grant until the existing company surrendered its charter, and went out of existence. We then made the grant to the State of Illinois, and she granted the land to a company subsequently created and organized, of which subsequent company no man of the original company was a member. It has been the great policy in all these instances to keep clear of all companies, and to make the grants to the State as a sovereignty, with entire power in her to do as she pleased when a grant was made for a State work.

In regard to this bill, there are no extraordinary powers given by it to the President. The right to locate the road between the points indicated in the bill is given to the contractors, and not to the President. The President only has the discretion to open the bids, and determine which of them is most favorable to the Government for transportation—a mere matter of calculation, a power now existing in the Executive Departments of the Government. In every instance the Postmaster General decides which bid is most favorable for the transportation of the mails on all the lines. The Secretary of War decides which bid is the most favorable for the transportation of Army supplies and munitions of war; the Secretary of the Navy, which bid is the most favorable for the furnishing of naval supplies. This bill only gives to the President the same discretion, when the bids are sent in in writing, to open and ascertain which is the lowest bid and which is most favorable to the Government for that transportation. Surely we ought to be willing to intrust that limited power to the President of the United States. The Government cannot exist without that discretion being placed somewhere, either in the President or in the heads of Departments. We thought it was better and wiser to have a united, single responsibility, by putting it in the President alone, than to have it divided among the different members of the Cabinet, inasmuch as this transportation relates part of it to the Post Office Department, part of it to the War Department, part of it to the Navy Department, and some of it perhaps to other Departments. We make a single head, a single responsibility, in deciding on these bids, by referring it to the President of the United States. I will not detain the Senate; I thought this much due to the Senator from Mississippi, who has made the objection.

Mr. BROWN. I do not design to continue this debate, but I call attention to the language of the third section:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said proposals shall be opened by the President, after due notice, in the presence of his Cabinet and such persons as may choose to attend; and he is hereby authorized and directed to enter into a contract for the transportation provided for in this act with the parties whose proposal shall be by him deemed most advantageous to the United States for the full and complete performance of said contract, in compliance with the provisions of this act."

"Shall be deemed most advantageous." Does not that leave the whole matter to his discretion? Does it not leave it perfectly unlimited? Why propose bids? It does not require him to take the lowest bid, or the bid of the lowest responsible party, but he is to take that which is deemed by him to be most advantageous. I think myself it leaves the whole subject to his discretion.

Mr. IVERSON. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday of my intention to offer some amendments to this bill, and I rise now for the purpose of suggesting them. Before I present the amendments, however, I propose to submit some remarks upon the general merits of the bill, as well as upon the amendments which I shall submit.

All agree as to the policy and importance, if not the necessity, for a railroad communication between the Atlantic States and the Pacific coast. The very large and increasing travel of our own citizens between the two sections, the rapidly growing population, wealth, and importance of our Pacific possessions, soon to form several powerful and flourishing States of this Union; the immense amount of mineral wealth which those and the intermediate regions contain, and which is to be extracted from the bowels of the earth for the benefit of the whole people of the United States; the increasing demands of commerce and social intercourse between the two sections; the necessity of protecting this vast region from the invasion of hostile nations, with which we may hereafter be at war, requiring the rapid and speedy transportation of troops, supplies, and munitions of war, from point to point—all conspire to urge the speedy construction of that channel of communication which shall be the cheapest, quickest, most certain, and secure, between the Atlantic and Pacific possessions of the United States. It is true that we have now the transit routes by the way of Panama and Nicaragua, and may in the process of time have others through the Central American or Mexican States, but these are outside of the United States and nearly entirely by sea. Whilst in peace our people who travel by them are subject to the capricious and arbitrary exactions of the foreign nations through which they pass; in time of war, all the troops, supplies, and munitions of war which we might find it necessary to send to the Pacific coast for the defense of those States, would necessarily encounter great danger from the enemy's ships, and fleets, rendering the transportation extremely hazardous and costly, if not entirely impracticable. These routes may be temporarily used as a matter of present necessity, but they cannot be relied upon for permanent purposes.

The vast interests which may be at stake in the event of war, and which may depend upon a speedy and safe communication within the limits of our own country, make it imperative that such a communication should be established at the earliest practicable period. It is also true that we have several wagon roads, between the confines of the Atlantic States and the Pacific, over which people may travel, emigrants may find their way, mails may be carried, and even troops and munitions of war may be transported; but the delay and enormous expense of these routes render them highly inconvenient in time of peace, and utterly useless in time of war. The only speedy, cheap, and certain communication for travel, mails, commerce, troops, and military stores, is by a railroad—a railroad which would convey any amount of passengers and freight; which would carry all the mail matter of the United States; which would transport any number of troops or seamen from its terminus on the Mississippi or Missouri river to San Francisco in five days, and for at least one third the cost of the present routes. The importance and necessity of the work must be apparent to, and conceded by, all honest and intelligent men. How and when is such a great work to be accomplished?

The average distance from the Missouri or Mississippi river (the probable eastern beginning of such a railroad) to the Pacific ocean, is about two thousand miles. I need not stop to enumerate the obstacles to be overcome, and the difficulties to be encountered, in the construction of the road. It could not cost less than fifty millions upon any route that has heretofore been surveyed, or that is ever likely to be discovered. Upon some of them it would cost double that sum. Such an undertaking is scarcely within the power of individual enterprise and means. If there was an abundance of capital, and no want of public spirit, still no company of individual stockholders could probably be found who would be willing to undertake such a gigantic work, to expend such a vast sum, and run such dangerous risks in its construction, for the uncertain profits which would arise from it, at least for many years of its early existence. It may well be considered certain, therefore, that without the aid of Government no Pacific railroad can or will be built for a half century to come.

When the vast country between the present inhabited portions of the United States on the east and west, stretching from Nebraska, Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas, across the great plains and the Rocky Mountains to Oregon and California, shall be settled up by whites, and shall furnish travel and mineral or agricultural products for railroad transportation, then, and not till then, will individual wealth and enterprise be bold enough to run the iron horse between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans over any route within the United States. The important, pressing, and controlling exigencies of the Federal Government and the people of this country cannot wait upon so slow a process. Time is important. The demands of the public service are pressing. The great interests of commerce, of civilization, and of progress, are calling loudly and sharply for action.

How is this great, essential, necessary avenue of trade and travel to be opened, and in the shortest possible time? It can only be done by the aid of the Government. It may be done, in my opinion, by the legitimate and reasonable aid of the Government. In the bill now under consideration, there are two modes by which governmental aid is to be given to individual enterprise in the construction of this desired work—one, a donation of public lands; the other, a mail contract for a term of years, with certain amounts of payments in advance, to be refunded back to the Government in railroad service.

It is proposed to make a donation, to any private company which may engage to build the road and carry the United States mails, troops, &c., of the alternate sections of the public lands for twenty miles on each side of the road. This would give the company ten sections on each side, or twelve thousand eight hundred acres for each mile of road constructed. I do not object to the quantity of land proposed to be granted. Running, as the road will, for four fifths of the way, or more, through an uninhabited, and much of it a sterile region, the lands would be worth nothing to the Government without the road, and very little, either to the Government or the company, with the road, at least for many years to come; and if the road adds value to the lands granted, the remaining lands reserved by the Government will also be enhanced in value, so that nothing will be lost to the public Treasury by the operation.

I know, sir, that many persons deny the power of Congress to make these grants to railroads. Whilst I have great respect for their opinions, I cannot concur in them. I have not, and never had, any doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to make these grants. The power is given in the Constitution in express terms:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

It may sell, or lease, or give; if it sells or leases, it may fix the price and prescribe the terms; it may sell for cash, or on credit; it may sell at public auction, or private sale; it may, in short, make any disposition of it which, in its judgment, may be for the interests of the United States. The only limit to its discretion is the obligation of good faith as a trustee to the cestui que trust of the property, to make the best bargain it can for the benefit of the owners, within the bounds of honesty and fair dealing. The public lands, either in the States or Territories, are held by Congress in trust for the several States, or the people of the United States. The power to dispose of them has been conferred upon Congress; it is the duty of Congress so to dispose of them as in its judgment will most conduce to or promote the interests of the Government and people.

The whole matter is within the judgment of Congress. If it judges unwisely, if it acts corruptly, if it fools away the property, the remedy is in the hands of the people themselves. They can dismiss the agents and appoint or elect new ones; they can pass sentence upon their unfaithful servants at the ballot-box, and intrust their interests to safer and wiser and better men. But whatever may be the temporary evils in the management and disposition of the public domain, consequent upon or arising from the weakness or corruption of those who are intrusted with its management, the power to manage, control, and dispose of it, within a sound discretion, is distinctly conferred in the Constitution upon Congress. When, therefore, it is proposed to make a grant of land to a railroad company in advance of its construction, the only question to be considered and determined by Congress, the trustee, is as to the policy and expediency of the grant. Is it the best disposition, all things considered, that could be made of the lands in question? It is certainly the fact that, in almost every case where lands are thus given, either the road, without the grant, would not be built at all, or would linger for many years in its construction. In the mean time, the lands are unsalable and unsold. Without facilities for travel and transportation to market, emigration is slow, population is sparse and poor, and the country remains unsettled and uncultivated. Make the grant of land, and thereby secure the early construction of the road, and the country opened up by it rises at once into importance and notice. Emigration becomes active, population flows into it, the lands rise in value, and the Government sells its reserved sections for as much or more than it could have got for the whole, without the road, and sells them sooner. Does any injury result to the cestui que trust by the operation? Is one dollar taken from the public Treasury? Does not the Government obtain a full and fair price for the whole of the property? Such is the direct result. And look at its collateral effects. The road is built, an avenue of trade, commerce, convenience, and travel is opened; population flows into the adjoining country; property rises; agriculture, commerce, and the arts, increase the wealth, promote the prosperity, and add to the power of the State. The benefits of the operation are ramified and incalculable.

While, therefore, the power clearly exists, the expediency and propriety of making these grants cannot, in my opinion, be for a moment doubted. I believe that is expedient, proper, wise, and necessary that the power should be exercised in the present case, and I am willing to vote a donation of lands to the extent indicated in the bill, provided the other provisions of the bill shall be so molded as to suit my views of what is necessary and proper to be done.

The other mode of giving governmental aid to the great object proposed by the bill before us, is to make a contract with the company that undertakes to build the road, to carry the United States mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, &c., for a period of years, and at a certain rate per mile per annum; and to advance to the contractor equal portions of the aggregate sum, as each section of twenty-five miles of the road is completed; the sum thus advanced, with interest, to be repaid to the Government in service performed under the contract. It is scarcely necessary or proper to assert or argue that the power to do this is within the constitutional competency of Congress. The power to establish post offices and post roads is especially granted to Congress in the Constitution. The power to cause the mails to be carried on these roads, and to and from these offices, is not only a proper but necessary incident to the specific grant. Congress, in its discretion, instead of employing its own carriages or wagons and horses, hiring its own drivers and agents, has considered it more economical, and in all respects wiser, to contract with individuals for carrying the mails, under such rules and regulations as are established by law. Government can establish a Pacific railroad as a post road; it may establish post offices on the route to be supplied with mails. It has already post offices on the Atlantic and on the Pacific side of the Union to be supplied with mail service. Congress may, therefore, make or authorize to be made a contract for the transportation of the mails upon the road or roads to be constructed across the continent; may stipulate the price and other terms; may make a contract for one or more years; and may pay at stated periods, after the performance of the service, or in advance of it if it shall consider that to be the best for the Government and the people. It is for Congress to decide upon, and to instruct the execution by law, the terms and conditions upon which this public service is to be performed, and which, in its judgment, will best promote the public interests. The power is unlimited, except by the obligation of good faith, in providing for the protection and promotion of the public interests, by as speedy, cheap, and safe transportation of the mails, and other Government property, as possible.

With the power clearly existing in Congress, who can doubt the propriety, expediency, and wisdom, of making a contract for carrying the mails, &c., and advancing reasonable amounts to the company from time to time, which, with other Government aid and their own private resources, would enable them to prosecute and complete a work of such vast and paramount importance?

Entertaining no doubt, myself, I cannot hesitate to authorize such a contract, with necessary and proper conditions and restrictions, as will, in my judgment, go further to promote the great object in view than any other step which Congress could constitutionally adopt.

It may be asked, if Congress can aid in the construction of a road by a donation of public lands, and by advancing money upon a mail contract, why may not Congress build the road, on the Government behalf, by an appropriation of money direct from the national Treasury? I answer that the power to dispose of the public lands is specifically granted in the Constitution; the power to provide for mail service and other public transportation is necessary and proper to carry specific grants into effect. But there is no power granted in the Constitution to Congress to build railroads, construct canals, improve rivers, or appropriate money for these objects. Congress cannot appropriate money for the construction of any work of internal improvement which is not absolutely necessary for the Government use, or to execute some other specific constitutional grant of power. I do not consider that there is such an absolute necessity for a railroad or roads across the continent, either for the transportation of the mail, or the Government troops, military stores, and munitions of war, as would justify Congress, under the Constitution, in expending many millions of the public money, and undertaking the construction of such a road by its own agents and its own means. The mails may be carried, as they are now carried, either by the isthmus routes or overland in wagons and carriages. Troops, seamen, stores, and munitions may be transported by the same routes. It is true, that the process is so slow, hazardous, and expensive as almost to make the construction of a railroad a necessity; but still not of such pressing and obligatory character as to draw therefrom the right, under the Constitution, to build it at Government cost; and, even if the Government had the power, under the Constitution, to construct the road at its own expense and under its own supervision, it would, in my opinion, be highly injudicious and inexpedient to do so. The reasons against such an undertaking by the Government are too numerous and too obvious to require mention here. The most ardent friends and wildest enthusiasts in favor of a Pacific railroad do not propose or press its construction by the Government. Such a scheme does not deserve to be considered; it is utterly out of the question. Any road or roads which may be demanded by the great interests of the country, must be constructed by private enterprise and managed by individual capacity.

The Government should only lend its aid in such form and manner as the Constitution justifies and the national convenience and ability may permit. Possessing, as I think it does, the rightful power and the pecuniary ability to give its aid in the manner and form, and to the extent proposed by this bill, I am willing to adopt the general principle of governmental aid in securing the accomplishment of the great national object of a railroad communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, within the territory of the United States.

But, sir, although I am in favor of the general principles of the bill under consideration, I am opposed to the bill itself as it now stands, and cannot give it the sanction of my vote, without material alterations. The bill, as it now stands, provides only for one road, and circumstances which must necessarily arise will control its location. The bill itself prescribes that its eastern terminus shall not be south of the mouth of the Kansas river, whilst its western termination is to be San Francisco. Where else can the road be located, with these termini, than along one of the northern routes which have been surveyed? Nor does it require any great degree of sagacity to understand that its location along one of these northern routes will be controlled by the great and all-powerful interests of the wide-spread network of northern railroads which cover the surface of the earth between New York and the proposed eastern terminus of this Pacific road. A combination of the various and vast interests connected with the roads starting from New York, as a base, and running through the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, or Wisconsin, will beat and bear down all opposing rivalry, and force the location of the Pacific road on such route as their interests shall dictate. That route must be one at least as far north as the thirty-eighth degree of north latitude, and very probably will be still higher up. The railroad, therefore, provided for by this bill will be a northern road, having its location on a northern route—making connections with a northern system of roads, pouring all its Pacific travel and trade into the northern States, and emptying all its rich fruits into the lap of northern cupidity and capital. The southern States of this Union will have little interest in such a road. Like a large and flourishing tree, covered with ripe and rich fruit, it will be surrounded by a dense throng of eager northern gatherers, who will clutch all its choice productions, leaving only a few decayed and worthless morsels to their southern friends, who stand afar off, on the very outside of the circle of greedy expectants.

Sir, the public lands which will be given to this road were purchased by the money and blood of the South as well as of the North. They belong as much to the South as to the North. The large sums of money to be appropriated in aid of this road are to be taken from a common Treasury, to which the South contributes her full share. The South is entitled to a full participation in all the benefits which are to be derived by the aid of the Government from the proposed pathway across the continent to the Pacific ocean. The amendments which I propose to offer to this bill look to this object, and are intended, and I think calculated, to secure it. Whilst they concede the aid of the Government to the fullest extent, in the shape of public lands, to a northern route, they also contribute the same amount of moneyed assistance, in the form of a contract for carrying the mails and other property of the United States, to a southern route.

There is another serious objection, to my mind, to this one-road project of the Senator from California. The circumstances and causes to which I have alluded, and which will inevitably control the northern location of the road, will throw the lands to be granted, and the money to be advanced, into the hands of a northern company of jobbing speculators. What guarantee is there that the road will ever be carried to the Pacific? They commence the road at some point on the Missouri river; they locate it through Kansas, Nebraska, or other habitable territory of the United States, and construct it as far out west as the country is worth anything and will afford remunerating travel and trade; they get the lands donated by Congress—twenty sections for every mile of road finished; they receive the advance of $12,500 per mile for mail service; and they complete two or three hundred miles of road, get from two to three million acres of valuable land, receive in hand a like sum of money, and then cease its further construction! Sir, I entertain very grave doubts whether, with all the proposed aid in lands and money, any company will ever be found to carry out the great leading object of the bill—a railroad connection with the Pacific coast—over any of the northern routes. The distance from the Missouri river to San Francisco cannot be less than two thousand miles: the road cannot be constructed over any of the routes heretofore surveyed, or that can be selected, at a cost of less than fifty thousand dollars a mile, or one hundred million dollars. The average cost of railroads in the northern States of the Union is not less than forty thousand dollars a mile. How much, then, will the road cost, traversing desert plains and crossing lofty mountains, covered with snow for a great part of the year, and through regions inhabited only by savages and wild beasts?

If it should cost only a hundred millions, would it ever pay? would the stock ever draw a dividend? What shrewd, intelligent Yankee will ever invest his money, his labor, or his time, in such an undertaking? I do not say, sir, that a northern road is impracticable. Money can overcome all obstacles. A road may be built even on the most northern route, but at such an enormous expense as would render the stock utterly worthless. I do not believe that such a road as the bill contemplates, and must inevitably produce, will ever reach the Pacific ocean.

But, sir, whether this be so or not, whether a road will ever be built on a northern route with the proposed aid of the Government, I think justice demands that equal provision should be made for a connection over a southern route. I feel very confident that, with the Government aid proposed by this bill, a road located either upon the thirty-second or thirty-fifth parallel would be certainly and speedily constructed. I am not prepared to institute an extended comparison of these two routes. I believe a first-class railroad might be built on either of them, with the assistance from the Government which is suggested in my amendments. The route on the thirty-second parallel would have the advantage of being much shorter in distance; for I consider the completion of the road now under progress through Texas, from the neighborhood of Shreveport, in Louisiana, to El Paso, on the Rio Grande, a distance of seven hundred miles, as a fixed fact. The munificent grant made by the State of Texas to that road, of twenty sections of land and $6,000 in money to each mile, will insure its rapid construction and early completion. From the Rio Grande to the Pacific, a distance of seven hundred and fifty miles, is the only portion which would have to be provided for and constructed by the Pacific Railroad Company, which would contract with the President for its construction, and the transportation of the mails and other Government property. No road on any other route can be accomplished short of two thousand miles. On the thirty-fifth parallel, the road must begin at Memphis, or some other point equally distant. It would have to be constructed through the entire State of Arkansas, thence up the Canadian river and on to the Rio Grande at Albuquerque, and thence across to the Pacific. Nevertheless, I am much inclined to believe that, with even this disparity of distance, over which the road would have to be built, the upper route on the thirty-fifth parallel is the cheapest, safest, and best route. The whole route from the Mississippi to the Colorado traverses a comparatively level country and elevated and healthy region, abounding with wood and water, and containing a large quantity of valuable lands both for agricultural and mining purposes. But whichever of these routes is best, or whichever may be selected, it is certain that either is practicable, and at a cost far below that of any northern route.

I feel assured that the donation of public lands, and the mail contract proposed by my amendment, will secure the construction and completion of a road over one or the other of these routes, and within the time limited by the bill.

Now, sir, I am unwilling to vote the large amount of aid in land and money contemplated by this bill on any single road, unless the locality be fixed beforehand, and a practicable, certain, and just one selected. I am willing to provide for the construction of two roads—a northern and southern road. I am willing to make the same grant of lands to each. I am willing to authorize the President to enter into a contract with both for the transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and other public services—one to take the mails and other transportation of its section; the other to carry them within its own limits. Let the North take her lands, her contract, and her route, and build her road, if she can. The South will be content to take the same advantages, and, I trust, would make a manly effort to accomplish this, the greatest enterprise of the age. If she fail, the fault and the loss will be hers.

I proceed now, Mr. President, to read the amendments which I intend to offer to this bill; and I suggest to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] whether it would not be better for him to withdraw his amendment at present until the sense of the Senate is taken on the propositions which I shall submit. The proposition which I shall submit, as I have already stated, looks to the formation of two roads, one north of latitude 36°, and the other south of that parallel. My proposition is that the contractors, or the company, or whoever may undertake to construct these roads, shall select both the eastern and western termini, and shall select the route over which the roads shall be constructed. Doubtless the contractors, whoever they are, will be controlled by their own interest, and will seek the best practicable route. So far as carrying the mails and other public transportation is concerned, I propose that each of these roads shall have its share of the public business. I propose that all the mail and other public transportation lying most contiguous to the northern route shall be by contract sent over that route, and all lying most contiguous to the southern route shall be, by the contract to be entered into, transported over that route, on such terms as the President in the contract shall designate under the restrictions and limitations contained in the bill.

I move to strike out the first section of this bill, and insert this as the first section:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States shall, as soon after the passage of this act as may be convenient, cause advertisements to be inserted in two newspapers in each State and Territory, and in the District of Columbia, for a period of not less than three nor more than six months, inviting sealed proposals for the construction of a northern Pacific railroad, to be located within the United States, and north of the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude, the termini and route thereof to be selected and determined upon by the contractors: Provided, The eastern terminus shall not be east of the Missouri river; which said proposals shall stipulate for the construction of said railroad and for the performance of the public service herein required, as follows.

Then I take article one of the bill as it is, as to the time in which it is proposed to construct and finish the entire road, and leave the second condition the same; and then, instead of the third article as contained in the bill, I propose to insert as follows:

At what rate per mile per annum, not exceeding $250, it is proposed to transport over said road the United States mails for all that portion of the United States more contiguous and convenient to said road than to the southern Pacific railroad provided for by this act; the same to be carried both ways under the direction of the Post Office Department for the period of twenty years.

And then I adopt the terms and language of the bill as already reported. I propose to add another section to come in at the end of the bill, after the northern road is provided for, and all the other provisions of the bill are adopted by the Senate as reported by the committee.

And be it further enacted, That in the advertisements provided for by the first section of this act, the President shall also invite proposals for the construction of a southern Pacific railroad to be located within the United States, and south of the thirty-sixth parallel of north latitude, the termini and route thereof to be selected and determined upon by the contractors: Provided, The eastern terminus shall not be east of the Mississippi river, and that the President shall enter into a like contract for the construction of said road under the same provisions, conditions, limitations and restrictions, and with the same advantages as hereinbefore recited and made applicable to the said northern Pacific railroad, for the transportation of the United States mails, troops, seamen, stores, munitions of war, and all other public service for all that portion of the United States more contiguous and convenient to said southern road than to the northern Pacific railroad provided for by this act.

It will be perceived, Mr. President, that I propose to provide for two routes, and to make a donation of public land to the extent of twenty sections per mile—ten sections on each side of the road; and also to make a contract with each company for the transportation of the mails and other public property of the United States, under the same restrictions and limitations as to prices that are already prescribed in the bill under consideration. But, instead of advancing $25,000,000 to the road that is provided for by this bill, I propose to make a contract, and agree to make an advance of $12,500,000 to each road, so that the aggregate sum will be the same, $25,000,000, as proposed by the bill; that is to say, I give to the northern road the donation of public lands, the whole which is provided for in this bill; I give to the northern road a contract for carrying the mails, munitions of war, troops, &c., of the United States to the extent of $12,500,000; and propose to advance to it, in United States bonds, as each section of twenty-five miles is completed, $6,250 a mile, instead of $12,500, as provided by the bill. The contract is to specify that, when the road is completed for twenty-five miles or more, or finally, the company shall be entitled to the transportation of the mails at a rate not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars a mile.

It will be perceived that the bill itself, which provides for only one road, agrees to give to the company the contract for the mails at a price not exceeding five hundred dollars per mile per annum. I propose to divide this mail contract and to give not more than two hundred and fifty dollars a mile. I think that is ample. I believe that is the maximum sum that is given on any railroad in the United States for mail service even of a more important character than is intended to be supplied by these roads. I think the Government does not pay more than two hundred and fifty dollars a mile upon any railroad in the United States for mail service. If it does, it is under extraordinary circumstances, and it is not of a general character. Then I propose to let these roads take the business which appertains to the particular section in which each is constructed. My opinion is that with this aid from the Government and with a contract of this sort, whatever may be the fate of the northern road, which I consider exceedingly doubtful, notwithstanding all the power of the Government and all the aid which may be brought to bear, I believe at least, that the southern road can be and will be constructed; and I believe that the southern routes, either the thirty-second or thirty-fifth parallel, are the only routes across the continent that ever will be used for a Pacific railroad. Still, however, I am not unwilling to give to the North the opportunity of constructing their road and the same advantages and the same privileges and the same gifts which I propose to the southern route.

On the thirty-second degree of north latitude, let us see the feasibility and probability of the construction of the road. There is already a railroad now in process of construction, and more than half completed, from Vicksburg, in Mississippi, to Shreveport, and thence to the Texas line of Louisiana. The means are already provided for the completion of that road. That is a link from the Mississippi river. That road then connects with the great Texas road, a branch of the Pacific railroad, which is now in process of construction, and to which the State of Texas, as I have said, has granted a donation of twenty sections of land and $6,000 per mile in money. This, I think, will secure the construction of that road. I understand from good authority that the company have already constructed a sufficient amount of road to secure this valuable grant.

The construction of that link of seven hundred miles by private enterprise, I consider settled beyond all dispute. The only part, then, which will have to be constructed by the new company—a Pacific Railroad Company—will be from the Rio Grande, at El Paso, (where the Texas road intersects that river,) to some point on the Pacific ocean—San Diego, San Pedro, or San Francisco; as the interests of the company may hereafter dictate. If that route be adopted, the amount which will be called for from the public Treasury, under the operations of my amendment, will be far less than upon any other route. If the route on the thirty-fifth parallel be adopted, the road must be commenced at the Mississippi river, for, although there are roads chartered in the State of Arkansas, and one from Memphis, by way of Little Rock, to Fort Smith, which will be the route this road must necessarily take, if that parallel be adopted; and although work is now actually in progress on them, and a road is being built from opposite Memphis, on the Mississippi river, to Little Rock, contemplating to go higher up, to the extreme confines of the western part of Arkansas, at Fort Smith, yet still I do not believe that company, with the aid in public lands which has been given to it, will be able, for many years to come, to construct that road through the State of Arkansas.

If my amendment passes, the probability is, that the companies which are interested in the work through the State of Arkansas will join any Pacific Railroad Company which may be formed for the construction of this great work, and the interests of the two companies will be combined. That road, under the provisions of this amendment, will be commenced at Memphis, will run through the State of Arkansas, thence up the Arkansas river until it meets the Canadian, and thence on to the Pacific. This is the most eligible route, in my opinion, and probably it is the cheapest route which can be found between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. I am satisfied that if either of the two southern routes be selected, a road over them must necessarily, and will at no distant day be constructed.

I believe, sir, that it is just, and due to the southern people, that we should have the aid of the Government, if Government aid is to be given at all for the construction of our own road. It is certain that if this bill passes in the form reported by the Senator from California, the South will never have any interest in the road which is to be constructed under it; and it is unfair, it is unjust, it is ungenerous that the public Treasury and the public lands, which belong as much to the southern as the northern people, should all be taken to promote the interests of the North. Sir, already complaints are uttered, and justly uttered, against the vast disparity of public expenditures in the two sections. From the formation of the Government to the present time, where one dollar of the public money has been appropriated to be expended in the southern States, at least five dollars have been expended in the northern and western States of this Union. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] says ten; I said five, to be within the bounds of reason. It is very probable that at least ten to one have been expended in the northern States; and now it is proposed to build this great thoroughfare across the continent, which is to pour such an immense amount of riches into the lap of the country which it taps, at the partial expense, at least, of the General Government and of the public Treasury. Sir, I object to the proposition; I think it is unjust and unfair to the southern portion of this Union that the benefits of this Government shall be conferred exclusively upon the other section. I am willing to adopt the principle of the bill, and to give public lands, and a contract for mail transportation and other public service to two roads, and let each section then take its route and build its road if it can. With these views, which I have expressed as rapidly as possible, I shall offer the amendment when I get the opportunity to do so.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the time has gone by long since when it was either necessary or profitable to discuss the necessity and importance, or the feasibility of a railroad to connect the Atlantic States with the Pacific. I think that, with the exception of a very small portion of Congress, there is a general agreement here, as well as in the country, that a railroad is necessary, and ought to be built; and I think it has been scientifically demonstrated to the satisfaction of a very large majority of Congress that not only one such road is feasible, but that at least three, four, or five routes offer the necessary facilities for the security of this great object.

When we have overcome the objections of the impossibility of the improvement, and its want of importance, we have only reached what, perhaps, is the most difficult stage of the question. While practically everybody admits that a railroad ought to be built somewhere, in some way, and begin at some point, and end at some other point—we find that it is of all things the most difficult in the world to procure the consent of a majority of Congress to an agreement upon the time when it shall begin, the manner in which it shall be prosecuted, and the route upon which it shall be made. Just as soon as we approach these questions we find ourselves embarrassed with difficulties. Now, Mr. President, I have long since given over all idea of being able to procure a general consent of Congress upon the definite route upon which the road shall be built, on all the details of a plan on which it shall be built, or on the manner in which it shall be paid for. If there is not some surrender of individual opinions; if there is not some trust and confidence reposed in somebody to determine some of these things for us, we shall never succeed in consummating the enterprise. The Representatives of the more northern portions of the Union will justly, or at least excusably, require that the road shall be made through their region, and the more central routes will each reasonably claim that the road shall not pass them by on the north or on the south; and we have already seen that the Representatives of the southern States will demand the same thing. So that, while we all agree upon making a road in the abstract, we cannot agree at all upon where it shall be made. I have looked at this matter in a practical light; I found myself in this position, perhaps, one somewhat peculiar. While I have my preferences for some quite northerly route, and should strenuously insist upon that, if I was called upon to decide in favor of one and against all others, I, at the same time, have such views in regard to the immediate urgency and importance of this great measure, and of its diffusive benefits, that I think I am prepared to support a Pacific railroad bill which shall be acceptable to a majority of Congress, though it shall overrule all my own opinions and preferences.

I am one of the select committee who have introduced this bill. We took this practical view. We tried to ascertain what bill could we submit to Congress that would obtain the votes of thirty-two members of the Senate and one hundred and eighteen members of the House of Representatives. In other words, what project is there, if any, upon which one hundred and fifty-one votes can be concentrated in the two Houses of Congress—for these constitute majorities in both Houses. It would seem no easy undertaking to devise a plan which would secure one hundred and fifty-one votes on a question so distracting. We found it so, for our committee consisted of nine; and if it had been an equal number we certainly should have found it impossible, for a long time, to devise any plan, or to find any route upon which we could get a majority of the committee to concur. We succeeded in devising a system, and a route which would secure five votes in our committee out of the nine; and we submit that as the best that could be done. We have made sacrifices of opinion; sacrifices that seemed to us almost of principle; sacrifices of devotion to the local interests, for the purpose of being able to offer a bill to the House with reasonable expectation that a majority, or each House of Congress, could be induced to accept it.

This plan, simply stated, is this—I leave out of view the details as to the expense and cost: The President of the United States is directed to invite propositions for carrying the mails and the military and naval stores of the Government between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts by railroad; which, of course, draws after it the consequence that those whose propositions shall be accepted shall prepare the railroad upon which the transportation shall be conducted. After a full opportunity has been given for competition, the President of the United States, under circumstances designing to guaranty publicity and secure fairness and impartiality, is directed to settle the route upon which the road shall be made between two important cardinal points, that is the place in the Atlantic States from which the road shall depart, and the place on the Pacific at which it shall end. It seemed necessary to the committee that these two points must be determined, or at least we must practically determine them.

All the circumstances of the present condition of the country, all the history of the commerce of the Pacific, all the speculations in regard to the future commerce between this continent and the East, seemed to us to indicate San Francisco, in the State of California, as the important commercial entrepot for the present century, and for centuries to come, on the Pacific coast.

Having ascertained that point, it was then thought proper to examine, in the next place, whether we could agree upon a point on this side. If there were no railroads through the Atlantic States connecting the Atlantic coast with the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, it would have been equally easy to determine the location of the eastern terminus of the Pacific railway. Nature, and the conditions of commerce as it is established for this century, and many centuries to come, have determined that the great entrepot of commerce in North America on the Atlantic coast, must be the city of New York. Make a railroad, then, from San Francisco eastward on any route that you may, the trade and the passengers which are to be transported over it, must be delivered sooner or later, first or last, at the port of New York. But there are already railroads from this eastern point, New York, penetrating to the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers, and there are railroads also from many of the southern points, and from other and more northern points, radiating so as to intersect the most direct line of communication between the cities of New York and San Francisco. We have thought, then, that as these roads were already constructed, what would be wise for us to do would be to leave open, within certain limitations, the point on the western frontier of the Atlantic States from which the road should be built towards San Francisco.

The manufactures of the United States, the trade of the United States, the population of the United States, are largely in the northern portion of the Union, and we have selected the region between the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers—a line extending through four degrees of latitude, (about two hundred and forty or two hundred and fifty miles,) as furnishing some point of concentration for all the Atlantic States to connect with the Pacific railroad; and we have left the precise point on that line to be determined hereafter.

It would have been more according to my opinions, and yours, sir, [Mr. Foor in the chair,] if we could have fixed the eastern terminus with precision; but if we undertook to do it, we were met by difficulties about the greater dangers of obstructions to the road, about the greater expense, about the greater or less value of the land through which the road was to pass, to say nothing of local jealousies; and thus we found it impossible to obtain the consent of representatives, as well from the more northern as from the more southern States.

We thought, under the circumstances, that we must fix certain principles, upon which the choice of the route should be made; and supposing that we should be able to secure from the President of the United States, under all the responsibilities under which he would act in a decision on this subject, impartiality and fairness, we came to this conclusion: we recommended to the Senate that it should be left to the President to select from the propositions that one which would provide for building a railroad from a point between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers to San Francisco, in the State of California, on the most eligible route, reference being had to feasibility, shortness, and economy."

Feasibility, shortness and economy! These are the three important elements in the question, the three elements which, under any and all circumstances, the Government ought to consider, and must consider. The route ought to be selected with due regard to the feasibility and shortness, because it must be not only feasible, but as short as may be consistent with all economy. We thought that patriotic men, willing to surrender something, men impressed with a due sense of the importance of this object, could surrender local apprehensions and distrust upon the principles we have adopted here, provided they could have confidence it would be carried out impartially.

The last objection which I gave up to this bill, as it now stands, was the apprehension that a northern, or at least a central, route which I desired to have selected, which I think most important to the interests of the country, may possibly be that one which will not be most eligible, having regard to feasibility, shortness, and economy.

It relieves me in some degree to be assured, as I am by the honorable Senator from Georgia, who is also a member of the committee, that these general words will determine the route exactly, not only between the points which I desire, but upon the very parallel of latitude across which I would carry it. I wish, however, that I could have some more confidence in the liberal prophecy which he makes in my behalf in that respect. Sir, although we start from some point between the Big Sioux and the Kansas rivers, in the State of Missouri, and although we land at San Francisco, it is not altogether impossible after all, from the examination I have made of these surveys, that we may be carried down on this route to the latitude of the Texas route, and so stop at Guyamas before we reach San Francisco. Indeed, I have thought it possible that the road to be made under this bill, ought be made either north or south of that great central route which nature indicates and the interests of the country require, as I regard them.

But it was only this bill that we could combine a majority upon. I trust that under it a road can and will be made quite directly across the continent, from its eastern terminus to San Francisco.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that if we can get one hundred and fifty men in this Congress to agree to any bill, it will be this one; and that if we cannot secure the assent of a majority of this House and a majority of the other House to this bill, we shall not to any; and I am confirmed in that belief by this debate, so far as it has gone. The honorable Senator from Mississippi tells us truly that he is in favor of a Pacific railroad, sincerely and earnestly in favor of it, but that he cannot vote for this bill. One of his objections, as I understand him, is, that the measure is as yet premature. He argues that it is premature, because we are left to invite individuals to form themselves into a company, and we propose to enter into a contract with them under the expectation that they are to build a Pacific railroad. He argues that, if it were not premature, citizens would organize themselves, and apply to us, moved by a consciousness that the road would be productive. He apprehends that the contractors, under this bill, will commence the undertaking, receive lands and moneys, and then abandon it, and leave the road to fall into desolation. But that Senator has given us no other system upon which he will agree with us, even if we can agree with him. We are, therefore, to understand that we cannot have his support in any case. He objects to the road that it is too expensive to be made in the manner and on the principles adopted in this bill. He objects to the road, also, on the ground that it will be a political engine, more fatal to the welfare and liberties of this country than the United States Bank was.

The honorable Senator from Georgia, who cannot give his support to this bill, differs from the Senator from Mississippi. He does offer us a system. Unfortunately, that system will fail to obtain the support of the honorable Senator from Mississippi; for, while one road is too expensive for the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the honorable Senator from Georgia proposes two, and of relatively not very different expense. While the honorable Senator from Mississippi finds one road gives the President too much power, too much patronage, too much influence, and so be-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, APRIL 16, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 100.

comes a political engine worse than a United States bank, he is met by the honorable Senator from Georgia with a proposition to give the President double the political patronage and double the power for evil. Sir, Government must have capacity to do good equal to its responsibilities. The power to do good is always liable to be perverted to the doing of evil.

I think, then, sir, that the friends of this bill will have to do the committee the simple justice which I ask from them; and that is, to accept this bill, and stand by it, at least until it shall appear, in the course of this debate, that some other bill, fixing some other termini, assigning some other route, providing for the construction of the work upon some other principle, shall be offered, which will secure more votes than can be secured by this one. There may be, doubtless, some provisions in this bill which I would change. As I have said before, I am disposed to accommodate throughout on this subject; but I cannot change anything until I ascertain that I change to that which will be more practicable, and will offer a better chance of securing the success of the measure.

Mr. President, I beg leave, then, to say to the friends of this bill, that if the construction of a Pacific railroad is to be ordered by Congress at this session, we have got to agree upon some plan, and we all have got to sacrifice some prejudices and opinions, and some distrust. I must say, moreover, that if we do not begin to make a Pacific railroad soon, it will be too late to begin. It will be too late to begin it, because the difficulties will be increased every year. It will be every year more difficult to obtain a concert which it already surpasses our power to secure; too late, because it is just as impossible that the new States on the Pacific shall remain subject to this Federal Government, and in connection with it peacefully and harmoniously, without intercommunication across this continent, as it would be to maintain one federal system over this continent and a portion of Europe or a portion of Asia. It would be easier to maintain political institutions across the Atlantic than it is to maintain political institutions across this continent: for I think we are three weeks with our mails in reaching the Pacific coast, while it is only a ferry across the Atlantic, requiring a passage of but ten or twelve days.

If the people of California had remained in the condition in which we found them under the government of Mexico, there would have been no trouble about this matter. They were unambitious; they were poor; they were necessitous; they were dependent on remote power. But this Pacific possession of ours looms up with a rapidity and assumes a majesty that surpasses anything in our own history, or anything in the history of the world. They will be our equals, or they will not be of us. They cannot be equals while we have the capital, and have the law-making power here, with only an imperfect connection with them, and they are compelled to receive our laws, and to submit to our direction as their rulers. They must be equals, and they must participate justly and equally in all the advantages resulting from this federal system of government, or they will assume the independence which they are perfectly able to maintain in defiance of us and of the world.

I think, sir, that in regard to the intervening regions, every day this road is delayed is a day of delay, of cost, and of danger to the United States—to their peace, harmony, and welfare. If there had been a Pacific railroad in existence for the last six years across the continent, I have no belief that there would have been any question to-day dividing the Senate and House of Representatives in regard to the constitution of civil government in Kansas; I believe there would be no superstitious and seditious community in the recesses of the Rocky Mountains, casting off the authority of the Federal Government, and defying the power of the Republic. I believe it is by means of the railroad and the telegraph that we are to realize what the world has never before seen realized—a republican government extending itself across a continent, and maintaining its sway peacefully and justly. I have no belief that this Government can maintain itself, or ought to maintain itself, in any other way than peacefully. The moment that we come to the habit of depending on a standing Army for enforcing laws or compelling submission to authority, that moment we cease, if not to be a nation, at least to be a Republic.

It seems to me that the importance of this subject cannot be exaggerated. It is the realization of what all Europe has been striving for for the last four hundred years. It makes practical the expectations and anticipations of mankind that were the growth of the discovery of the mariner's compass, of the invention of the art of printing, of the exploration of the continent of Africa, and the discovery of a passage to the East Indies around the Cape of Good Hope, and of the discovery of the western passage that Columbus supposed he was making from Europe to the shores of Cathay. It realizes all these great thoughts and things. It changes the commerce of the world. It transfers it, in my judgment, across the American continent, from across its old and ancient channels by the Red sea and the Arabian gulf, and around the Cape of Good Hope. It is the great agency by which this Government is to become the highest and most important and beneficent among the Powers of the earth in promoting and advancing civilization and the progress of the human race.

Sir, I would enlarge on this subject; but, as I said in the beginning, it is not such general remarks that are necessary or pertinent to this occasion. All that any one can do, I think, to advance the completion of this object now, is to propitiate by candor and conciliation and mutual sacrifices, for the purpose of securing an agreement as to the route on which, and the circumstances and manner in which, the work shall be begun.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I deferred any proposition to amend the first section, giving a full opportunity, as was supposed, for all general remarks on the general subject of a Pacific railway, for I thought those general remarks would more appropriately be directed to the general subject. When I proposed this amendment, I presumed that it would be discussed, and that the debate would be directed to the propriety of striking out and inserting, or the impropriety of the proposition I have submitted. On the broad question of the importance of this railway, connecting the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific, it is not competent for me to enter upon it at this time, when I have a specific proposition submitted to the consideration of the Senate. I had almost waited too long. The bill has been taken out of the Committee of the Whole, and is now before the Senate proper; but when a proposition was made to amend the tenth section, I desired to go back and amend the first, and take up the bill in regular order. I had hoped therefore, this amendment would be considered and not the general subject.

This bill as it is now proposed, gives a discretion to the President and to the contracting parties negotiating with the President. The eastern terminus of this road is to be between the mouth of the Kansas river and the mouth of the Big Sioux, a distance of two hundred and eighty miles. Now, sir, the Senator from Iowa says, make a specific location, and the bill is defeated. He says, locate the eastern terminus at the mouth of the Kansas river, and this bill is defeated. If so, then the bill ought to be defeated.

Mr. JONES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say that the bill would be defeated. I said it would, in my opinion, endanger the passage of the bill. It would be manifest injustice to my constituents, and I should not be very much disposed to favor it then.

Mr. GREEN. I understand. We must leave a margin to play upon, and to hold out inducements never to be realized, in order to get gentlemen to vote for this bill. I prefer rather to come to specific points, and to know precisely what I am voting for. If the eastern terminus is to be the mouth of the Big Sioux, say so, and I will be prepared to govern my vote. If it is to be the mouth of the Kansas, say so. More than that, if there is to be discretion vested in the Executive at all, with regard to the location of the eastern terminus of this road, why do you bring up two points, and say it must be between those two points? Why not say from the Gulf of Mexico up to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude? Why not leave him this wide discretion? The very argument by which you are justified in circumscribing him to two hundred and eighty miles, will justify you in bringing him to the specific point; for if it is to be left to his unlimited discretion, open wide the portals; leave him unrestrained; permit him to go down to the Gulf of Mexico, or as high as our boundary with the British possessions. If we have a right to limit and circumscribe him at all, if it be good policy to do so at all, it is still better policy to leave nobody to be cheated, to leave nobody to be deceived, to leave nobody to be misled; for if the bill could not pass with the location at the mouth of the Kansas, and it should go anywhere else, and ultimately be located at the mouth of the Kansas, it would be a fraud on Congress. If the bill could not pass if the eastern terminus should be the mouth of the Big Sioux, and yet should pass with this discretion left in the hands of the Executive, and the location should be made at the mouth of the Big Sioux, it would be a fraud on the other branches of the Government.

There is but one fair, systematic, consistent mode in which we can proceed; and that is, to settle the subject for ourselves. When the Senator from New York says that this is the only mode of passing the bill, it is admitting that somebody is to be cheated under the bill. I want nobody cheated; I want the Congress to take the power with which they are invested by the Constitution, and exercise it; and, if they have a right to say, "we will make a road at all," say where that road is to be located.

I take it to be a fixed fact, susceptible of the clearest demonstration, that the through business from the Pacific to the Atlantic, over the barren plains west of the Missouri, will never justify but one road, if one. There is not a single railroad five hundred miles long, in the United States, upon which the through business will pay its regular running expenses. It is the way business, together with the through business, that supports and sustains the only roads that are supported and sustained. If this be so in the United States, where we have roads already made, and if we must run across the plains for more than five hundred or seven hundred miles, where there can be no way business, if you make two or three roads, and split up the through business, they must all break down, and fall to nought. Only one can be made; it is questionable whether one can be; but the political public wants of the Government are strong enough to induce me to go for one: I will go for no more than one. Only one is fit to be made. The transit can be made in the same time on one that it could on three. When it reaches the settlements upon the East, it will connect with a radiation of railroads, which will throw the benefits of that one road to all sections of the Union; and you do not need more than one. Accumulating the whole of the through business on one road may, perhaps, keep it up, together with the whole profits of carrying the mails, and doing whatever other transportation may be required by the public wants of the Government.

Then taking it as a conceded point that you can only have one road—and I think that is susceptible of mathematical demonstration—where ought that one to be? Ought it to be down in the barren sands of the South, from El Paso to Guayamas? Ought it to be up in the frozen regions of the North, to be obstructed by snows for more than six months in the year? If feasible south and north, would it be just to the rest of the Union to contribute to the construction of such a road out of the general fund belonging to the whole Union, the immediate benefits of which should be poured into the lap of one section only? I say not, sir; and when I propose the mouth of the Kansas I do it on the idea that it does accommodate the South as well as the North, and accommodate the North as well as the South. It is true it does inure a little more to the particular benefit of Missouri than any other State; but in any country there must be a center; and it so happens that Missouri is the great center on the western border of the United States, at least so far as the Atlantic States are concerned. And because it does inure a little more to her benefit, shall we therefore do injustice to Missouri in order to do still greater injustice to other portions of the Union? I trust not. To avoid Missouri, to shun her, and to prevent the accruing benefits resulting, and which must necessarily result, we are to do injustice either to the North or the South. Such an argument as that I hope will not prevail; and I hope this will not be charged as a proposition resulting alone from a selfishness on the part of the Missouri representatives. It is not. It is true that has had its due weight and consideration; but I ask any Senators to look at this subject and say, if we can have but one road, where ought its eastern terminus to be? So as to deal justly with both sections of the Union, where ought it to be? As near the center of the west line of Missouri as you can make it, according to my understanding of the geography of the country; and when it reaches there, the present facilities of communication will take that trade to St. Louis, to Chicago, to Charleston, to Baltimore, to Philadelphia, to New York—everywhere according as the inducements may be held out for it.

It will not do for the Senator from New York to speak of the city of New York as being entitled to any more than her just proportion. When the road strikes the center on the western borders of the Atlantic States, she has her equal opportunities to participate in the rich trade which is to flow from the Pacific ocean; and if she cannot sustain herself with equal opportunities, I hope to see Norfolk, Baltimore, Charleston, or Philadelphia, supersede her; but if she can sustain herself and get her due proportion, she is entitled to it.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator misapprehended me, or I must have misapprehended myself. I stated that I was satisfied that whether the road terminated north or south of New York in its connections with the Atlantic, it would result in the same thing. New York, as the center, would be the end of the railroad; so that I can vote for a railroad which shall start from Boston or Portland, and I should be entirely satisfied with it as a railroad to the Pacific ocean. I can vote for a railroad which shall start from Galveston or any other place in Texas and go through to San Francisco; and I believe New York will be, in the end, the eastern terminus of those roads. I stand here, therefore, perfectly satisfied.

Mr. GREEN. I am afraid that New York is not only to be the end of many things, but the end of the Union. [Laughter.] Sir, I know her power; I know her influence; and why the Senator should use his influence to throw the line up to a northern route, if it is to inure to the benefit of New York equally, whether it proceeds north or south, as he says, is inexplicable. He says he can vote for it, let it be located where it may; yet he also expressed his preference for a northern route. Why that preference, if it is all the same? In the name of common sense, if it is to center in New York, the State you represent and the city you represent, why have that preference at all? I have my preference because I believe we can sustain but one road, and I believe that one road ought to be central, and that the point I have indicated is central, and when it reaches there it will go through Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Arkansas, all the southern, middle, and northern States, and the trade coming over it will find its proper markets according as inducements may be held out in respective places.

As to which is the best route after you leave the eastern terminus, I do not deem it important to dwell at all. I have no doubt, from the little attention I have paid to the subject, that the route on the thirty-fifth parallel is the best; and if it be the best and the cheapest road to be made, why not allow the road to be commenced even still further south than the point I have indicated? If you will leave the Executive and contracting parties a discretion on the subject, take away the barrier you have inserted in the bill, and give him the privilege to go down as far as Fort Smith, as low south as even the Gulf of Mexico. If discretion is to be left to him, let it be such that he can locate it wherever he shall find the cheapest and best route; but by this bill you compel him to go up and locate it between the mouth of the Kansas and the Big Sioux. Take away your barrier altogether, or else fence it up so close that he cannot commence except at one single point. This is the whole purpose of my proposition. I have submitted it in good faith. It may not meet the approbation of a majority of the Senate. I believe it will accommodate the people of this Union; and if any one road is to be built, that ought to be the eastern terminus.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POLK. I wish to offer an amendment to the first section. I move to strike out the words, "between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers," and to insert, "on the western boundary line of the State of Missouri, or of the State of Arkansas, between the mouth of the Big Sioux river and Fort Smith on the Arkansas river;" so that the section will read:

"From a point on the Missouri river, or on the western boundary line of the State of Missouri, or of the State of Arkansas, between the mouth of the Big Sioux river and Fort Smith on the Arkansas river, to San Francisco in the State of California."

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. POLK. I shall not detain the Senate long, but I have made some calculations, the result of which I should like to present to the Senate.

Mr. MASON. It is too late for that now, I should say. If the Senator will yield me the floor, I will move an adjournment.

Several SENATORS. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me to send my amendments to the Chair, and ask to have them printed?

The proposed amendments were received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, in order that we may have an executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. GOODE. When the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union rose yesterday, I presume it was with the expectation that they would be organized again to-day, and proceed with the consideration of the police bill. If, therefore, it meets the approbation of the House, I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 232, to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] in lieu of the one offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD], and that upon this question the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will yield till I hear the amendment read.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to add two additional sections to the original bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Is an amendment in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments will be in order to the original bill when the committee comes to read it by sections, so as to perfect it before a vote is taken on the substitute.

Mr. FOSTER. I will offer the amendment, then, when the proper time arrives.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. It was stated yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] that the captain of the States' Hose held an office under the Federal Government. If I did not misunderstand him, that was his statement. It is not correct. The captain of the States' Hose neither holds an office under the Federal Government nor under the city government. The only appointment he ever held was under the Republican Doorkeeper of the last House, Mr. Darling; he was appointed by him to an office about this Capitol, and held it during the last Congress.

Mr. STANTON. I am very glad to be so informed, and I am happy to make the correction. My information was different.

Mr. MAYNARD. These remarks, Mr. Chairman, and others, which seem to have rather a party character, I shall not reply to or notice. I have, in this discussion, no party or partisan interest to subserve. I feel myself responsible to a very small degree, indeed, for the measure which is now brought to the consideration of the committee. It will be recollected that, some few days ago, the House, at my instance, adopted a resolution requiring the Committee for the District of Columbia to give their attention to this subject, with liberty to report at any time. This enabled them to bring in a bill which they had theretofore, as I am informed, nearly or quite matured.

When I introduced the subject into the House, I supposed, from what had occurred, that it was one which it was our duty, at least, to consider, if not to act upon. It was stated in many quarters, if not in all quarters, that the police of this city was either lamentably deficient, or woefully inefficient. Complaints were made, I believe, in every one of the papers of the city, morning by morning; and we were told of crimes that had been perpetrated during the night. The houses of citizens and strangers had been invaded, and their property purloined. Men had been assailed and robbed on our most public avenue, passing along about their ordinary and usual business.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. Over here we cannot hear the gentleman from Tennessee at all, and some of us desire to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible for the Chair to preserve order or to keep gentlemen from conversing and making a noise in the Hall; but unless order is preserved it is impossible for gentlemen to hear what is being said.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was proceeding to remark, Mr. Chairman, that we had the most abundant evidence, as I supposed, that this city, in common with many of the other cities of this country and across the water, was infected with what seemed to be a prevailing epidemic of crime, and that it was necessary to take some action not only for the general preservation of the peace, but also for the protection of persons and of property.

I shall not trouble myself to inquire into the causes of this state of things. I have, in common, I suppose, with every other gentleman, my own ideas as to the causes which, in whole or in part, have contributed to it; but I have no ambition to make myself a prophet of the past or to indulge in retrospective vaticinations on this subject. If other gentlemen choose to do so they have a perfect right; and whether their prophecies will be regarded or not will depend on the faith they may put in them. But, sir, in the course of this discussion remarks have been made by more gentlemen than one on this side of the House, and especially by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMINS,] which I do not feel at liberty wholly to pass over.

We are told that this condition of things, this want of police efficiency, this prevalence of crime in this city, is traceable to the courts of justice; and the blame is charged on the men who exercise the judicial functions in this District. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is one of the indications of the times in which we live, that there is a portion of the community disposed to make war upon the administration of justice as it is administered in our courts. Judges are held up to the condemnation and to the execration of the community. Charges are made against them in the pulpit, by the press, on the hustings, and now, lastly, in the legislative halls. If the pulpit in its ignorance, or the press in its presumption or its assumption, chooses to make war on the judges of our land, the responsibility be upon them.

But, sir, we occupy no such favored position. We are most of us lawyers; belonging to a profession whose duty it is to protect and sustain the administration of justice in its purity. Most often we are called upon to protect it against fraud, against the approaches of perjury and subornation of perjury, against private individual wickedness; but it is equally our duty to protect the courts of the country against popular clamor, against the cry of unthinking, unreasoning, un-knowing prejudice and fanaticism. Sir, it seems to me that gentlemen indulge in observations on the judiciary of the country, which, to say the least of it, are not creditable to themselves. If I, with my professional obligations resting on me, believed only one half of what I have heard others in this and the other wing of the Capitol declare they believed, I would use my utmost endeavors to move articles of impeachment against officers so assailed; and I would never rest till I had obtained a decision at the other end of the Capitol. Gentlemen owe it to themselves, they owe it to those judges who are impugned, they owe it to their constituents and the country, if they believe even one tenth part of what they charge so fluently and flippantly on judges—they owe it as a matter of high duty to bring to trial the men thus charged.

We are gravely told that because, a year or two ago, a then member of Congress, in one of the dining saloons of this city, got into a personal difficulty with a parcel of Irish waiters, in which one of them was killed, and the slayer brought to trial and acquitted, this is one of the great causes which have produced the murder and robbery that are stalking abroad in this Federal city. And then, again, a gentleman in this city assails another with a cane, and is arraigned for a breach of the peace, and fined $300; and that, we are gravely told, is another of the causes of this lamentable state of public morals and of the popular insubordination in this city. But, perhaps it will be said that one of these gentlemen was a member of this House and another a member of the Senate. Sir, if there is any breach of senatorial dignity, any breach of the privileges of this House, the Senate and this House will punish the offense. It is the duty of the judicial officers of the land to punish the breaches of the peace, and not to punish the breaches of the dignity or the privileges of either House of Congress. I would not have alluded to this subject but that this disposition to attack the judiciary of the country, to assail the men who are called upon to administer our laws, is alarming. Break down, in popular estimation, the judiciary; break down the confidence which the people have in the courts of justice, in the tribunals where they resort for the protection of their persons and their property, to assert their rights and redress their wrongs, and you destroy the efficacy of your laws, you are ready to inaugurate a revolution, and to bring the people to conclude that this republican Constitution is a failure, and that they must have another form of Government.

Impressed with these views, impressed with the necessity that some action should be taken to increase the efficiency of, and give additional vigor to, the present police force of this city, I am happy to take the bill which has been presented to us for our consideration, and to accord my assent to a large portion of its provisions. And I assure you, sir, and the members of this House, that in the criticism which I propose to make upon it I shall not be actuated by a factious opposition, or by any disposition to criticize and oppose it merely because I have the opportunity to do so. Still less shall I examine it in a partisan or political point of view; for, Mr. Chairman, the public man who believes that he has driven a nail into the wheel of his political fortunes so that it shall never again revolve, has studied the past history of our country to very little purpose. The party and the men who are in power to-day have no assurance that in twelve months they will be in power, or that their friends will be in power. It was remarked yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] no man in this country can say that he is in power; that he is beyond the reach of contingencies, beyond the reach of the changes and fluctuations in popular sentiment.

Mr. Chairman, in looking into the bill that has been presented to us by way of amendment to the bill of the Senate, one objection that strikes me at the threshold is, that the number proposed to be added to the present police force of the city is entirely too large. The present auxiliary police force numbers fifteen men. This act proposes to raise the force to one hundred, thus increasing it by the number of eighty-five. It seems to me that that is an unnecessary increase, especially when the bill is so framed as that we are obliged to have the hundred men under any and all circumstances. There is no discretion vested in any person or in any power to reduce it. The language of the act is declaratory, explicit. It is,

"That there be established an auxiliary guard or watch for the protection of persons and property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,000; one captain at an annual salary of $1,200, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly."

This difficulty, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, could be very easily obviated in a manner which would work no disadvantage to anybody. That is, by providing that one hundred should be the maximum number; and by leaving it to the discretion of the appointing power, under the exigencies of the times to make it that number or any number less that may be found sufficient. On this point I suspect we shall have very little difference of opinion.

But there is another question connected with this bill which goes deeper, and I suppose there will be an honest and very wide difference of opinion between the various members of the House. I refer to the mode by which this force shall be appointed.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman from Tennessee, and other gentlemen who spoke yesterday have spoken of the present number of the auxiliary guard. The present force is thirty, at an annual cost of $20,000. By looking at the official register the gentleman will find the correctness of my statement.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not referred to the official register for information. I referred to the act of Congress passed 23d of August, 1842; and that provides fifteen men. I am not aware of any subsequent legislation, nor do I know by what authority the additional fifteen are appointed. I presume the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia can inform us where that appointing power was obtained.

Mr. GOODE. By subsequent legislation, of course.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thank the gentleman for correcting my statement.

Mr. GOODE. The auxiliary guard are appointed by the Mayor, and are paid by the Federal Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then this bill proposes to add seventy to the present police force, which, it seems to me, is an increase hardly required. Certain it is, that I would not like to make that increase absolute and imperative.

But I was proceeding to speak of the mode by which this force is to be appointed. The appointment is to be made by the President of the United States. To that I have very serious and very grave objections. In the first place, it is a matter which, I think, we ought not to trouble the President with. I do not believe in bringing down that office to the dignity of a town constable and head of police. It may be said that all he has to do is to appoint the chief of police, and that there his duties end. I ask gentlemen to look at this bill and see if that is so. If it is so, then there is another most serious objection to it, greater even than that; because, if the President's duties are at an end with the appointment of the chief of police, then I ask, to whom is this chief of police responsible; and how long is he to hold his office? Suppose he is guilty of any amount of corruption and misrule and malfeasance in office, who has the power to remove him? who has the power to call him to account?

Mr. GOODE. The President.

Mr. MAYNARD. The President, says the chairman of the committee. Very well. Then it becomes a part of the President's duty to take an oversight of the police of this city, and to see that his appointee discharges his duty faithfully and properly, and that is bringing the President of the United States down to an office which I am unwilling to see him perform.

Mr. GOODE. He is bound to see every law faithfully executed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, that is all true as a general principle of constitutional law, and there are a great many other general principles in which we should agree—these horn-book elementary principles; the difficulty arises when we come to apply them.

But there is another objection to vesting the President with this appointing power. The President has patronage enough to dispense already, and I am opposed to increasing it unnecessarily. Still further, the President's duties are now quite too onerous; he has more work to do than any one man now living can possibly perform. Sir, if he had the administrative ability of a Julius Cæsar, or of a Napoleon—two men in the history of the world who, perhaps, performed the greatest amount of executive labor—it would be wholly impossible for him properly to discharge the duties devolved upon him as the head of this great and growing Government. He cannot do it.

But is that the only objection? Not at all. This force is called the auxiliary guard, very much; I suppose, upon the lucus a non lucendo principle. An auxiliary guard! Auxiliary to whom? Auxiliary in what way? The act of 1842, to which I have adverted, provides for the appointment of an auxiliary guard; and that is what it professes to be—a guard appointed by the Mayor, and paid by the Federal Government, in addition to the police of the city of Washington, to strengthen the hands of the municipal corporation. But this bill does no such thing. This bill inaugurates a system of absolute, uncontrolled, and irresponsible power, the like of which is not to be found anywhere in the civilized governments of the world. What do you propose to do by this bill? You propose that the President shall appoint, in the first place, a chief of police. Who is he to be? What are to be his qualifications? And where is he to come from? Silent is this bill on these subjects—entirely so. He may be from the State of California, or from Maine, or from South Carolina; he may be from England, or France, or Russia, or from regions further east. There is no restraint in this matter. You may bring a man here wholly alien in his feelings to this people, and put him in authority—an authority almost absolute and complete—over them. Then this man, so appointed, can appoint his one captain, his four lieutenants, and his one hundred men—men whom he may also bring with him from the same quarter whence he himself happened to come. And thus, from the very outset of the game, you place the fifty or sixty thousand permanent residents of this city under the control of a force that may have no sympathy with them, no interest in their well being, and no regard whatever excepting for the hand that feeds it, and no desire but to gratify the power upon which its bread and meat depend.

Then suppose this auxiliary guard mismanage in their office; suppose they exercise this mighty power like a tyrant; I ask what remedy have these people? Can they go to the ballot-box? No, no, they are without remedy. They are obliged to submit; ay, they have not even the miserable remedy which the down-trodden subjects of the Czar have by long-established prescription possessed—the infamous remedy of assassination.

Why, sir, your police force may establish in this city the curfew, requiring that nightly, when the eight o'clock bell shall strike, every fire shall be covered up, and every light be extinguished throughout the city. You may have every man, woman, and child, who walks these streets, liable to be arraigned and questioned, and made to disclose their whereabouts, their what-abouts, their whence and their whither, at the word and beck of this irresponsible body of men.

It is no answer to this objection to say that we do not suppose the present Chief Magistrate will execute this power in this way. It is no answer to ask me if I am unwilling to intrust the police of this city in the hands of the present Chief Magistrate. It is no answer for gentlemen to say that they would trust Mr. Fillmore if he were President, as soon as Mr. Buchanan. I might trust Mr. Buchanan, or Mr. Fillmore, or Mr. Pierce, but I would not trust the President of the United States as this bill proposes. Sir, I would not trust myself. There is no man, possessing any degree of self-knowledge, who does not know and feel in the very inmost recesses of his soul, that he, himself, is unfit to be the custodian of unlimited, irresponsible, uncontrolled power. But that is what this bill, as I read it, proposes to give to the President of the United States in making these appointments.

An allusion was made, yesterday, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] to the police system of the city of New York. As a personal retort it may have been very happily put—and upon that I have nothing to say—but it is no answer to the objection I am making; for, if I have understood what the general sentiment is with respect to the present police system of the city of New York, that sentiment is unfavorable to it, and the public voice is against it. But even that does not come within bow-shot of what is proposed here. The police system of New York places the police under the control of the general State government, of which the people of the city are a constituent part. This bill proposes to place the people of the city of Washington under the President of the United States, in constituting whom they have no part. The gentleman from Virginia will see that the distinction is a very wide and important one.

Mr. CLEMENS. The very principles upon which the gentleman from Tennessee proceeds to argue, show that the bill proposed by the committee is preferable to the one proposed by the gentleman from New York, and of which, I presume, the gentleman from Tennessee is the advocate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not presume too much.

Mr. CLEMENS. The President is in loco parentis to the people of this city, and the Congress of the United States is the local legislature, and the people of the District of Columbia have no right of sovereignty at all. They are here in the relation merely of children to the legislative department of the Government. The legislative power is given to Congress. But in the case of the New York police bill, they not only took away the power of appointment from the city, but gave it to the Governor of the State, who sent commissioners of police there from the interior of the State, in whose hands was placed the entire control of the police department of the city of New York. And that is the reason I alluded to the position taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMINS.]

Mr. RUSSELL. And made the city of New York pay the expense.

Mr. CLEMENS. That is so. Here the people have no power of taxation for police purposes. The money must come from the national Treasury, and that presents a strong reason why the President, who is the representative of the people of the United States, to whom the money belongs, should have the power of appointment.

Mr. MAYNARD, [pleasantly.] I desire to have at least half of the time, as I am upon the floor, and am responsible for the speech.

We are told that the people here stand in the relation of children to the President, as the head of the Federal Government. That has not been the policy of this Government hitherto. Among the earliest legislation of Congress, under the provisions of the Constitution, conferring exclusive jurisdiction over such district as might become the seat of the General Government, was a statute giving to the people of this city the power to regulate and control their own municipal affairs. They have had, from the earliest period, a municipal government for the protection and management of their local interests. They have had the power to govern themselves to a certain extent, and they have exercised that power; and I am opposed, at this late day, to depriving them of it. I am opposed to this auxiliary guard, of which they might well say, non tali auxilio.

A word in regard to the taxation of the people of this city, suggested by what fell from the gentleman from Virginia. I understand the fact to be that the city authorities have gone to the full extent of the taxing power conferred by the charter—the power to tax to the extent of three fourths of one per cent. upon the valuation of property. But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] intimates that they do not assess their property at its full value. I am told that they do; that property here is rated at its full cash value, and in some instances above it. I was told of one instance, as an illustration of it, that a piece of property, which sold for $1,200, was rated in the tax list at $1,800, fifty per cent. above its cash value in market.

Mr. SEWARD. Does the gentleman know what the aggregate value of the property in this city is?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not. I have not had occasion to examine the matter.

Mr. SEWARD. I wanted to know, so that I could ascertain what a tax of three fourths of one per cent. would amount to.

Mr. MAYNARD. Anybody with half an eye would see that for the various corporation purposes of this city, no ordinary amount of taxation would be sufficient. It is extended over a very large area of ground, a large portion of which is unimproved and unproductive. It is traversed by streets and avenues wider, more numerous, and more extensive than in any other city of the Union. It is a city of which the expenses, according to its population, besides those additional expenses put upon it by the fact of the location of the General Government here, would in my opinion, be double those of any other city in the country of the same population. This arises mainly from the manner in which the city is laid out. Besides this tax of seventy-five cents upon each hundred dollars of assessed property, there are other impositions laid upon the tax payers. For example, the lighting of the streets; for with the exception of Pennsylvania avenue and the public grounds, all the streets are lighted at the expense of the contiguous owners. Some gentleman near me says "No! they are not lighted at all." I admit I may be wrong, for there are some portions of the city in which I have never happened to be when artificial lights are necessary. The gentleman may be correct in his knowledge of the geography of the city.

Mr. CLEMENS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the citizens of Washington pay the whole expense for lighting it?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir.

Mr. CLEMENS. The Government pays for Pennsylvania avenue, and I never knew that there was but one street in Washington, and only one side of that street.

Mr. MAYNARD. I cannot help that. It is not my fault if the gentleman does not know it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I was alluding to this fact to show that it was vain to ask that the people of this city should bear the whole expense of its civic administration. True, we heard a remark made here the other day, by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KILGORE,] to the effect that if you would remove the seat of Government to his State, they would take care of it without any expense to the country. I imagine, however, if we were in Indiana, we would find the people there a good deal like the people elsewhere; for we find human nature very much the same everywhere.

Now, sir, this is not altogether a matter of dollars and cents with me. This is our Federal metropolis; this is the great capital of our great country; it is a city in which we all take an interest, in which we all take pride. I imagine there is scarcely a man, who, in his boyhood days, read the sarcastic notes appended to certain sarcastic poems, by a certain flippant Irish poetaster, that did not feel his blood flow with lively indignation that a man would defame and vilify the infant metropolis of his beloved country. I would make this city worthy of the great nation of which it is the seat of Government. I would make it such a place, that when we bring our children here to show them these gorgeous temples, these towering monuments, these magnificent piles of architecture, and when they ask what mean these stones, we could with pride point to them as the glorious memorial of what our fathers did, that we might here teach them new lessons of patriotism, and inspire them with a deeper and more ardent love of country.

But my friend from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] says he supposes I am in favor of this italicized amendment—the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DOBB.] I confess I am not. I read it with some care, and have tried very hard to see whether I could not favor it. It strikes me as a clumsy and awkward contrivance, which will be very difficult to carry into efficient operation, and which, if carried into operation, will be of very little use.

Now, sir, I do not know why we should depart from the policy which has governed Congress ever since the passage of the act of 1842. I do not see why we should take from the people of the District this power of self-government. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] introduced yesterday an argument, if I understood him, to this effect: that the charter of the city of Washington being a vested right, it cannot be changed or modified except with the assent of the corporators. I understood him to state that as a legal proposition.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The proposition I mean to assert is this: that whenever a municipal corporation is created, and vested rights arise under it, they cannot be infringed by the legislative power. It is not within the competency of the legislative power to amend the charter, except as to the political law, and this, too, under limitations.

Mr. MAYNARD. The case is stated in an elementary work of high authority, in a few succinct paragraphs, which I will read:

"It is a happy feature in the Constitution of our own Government, that the power of the Legislatures of the different States resembles in this particular the prerogative of the King of Great Britain, who may create but cannot dissolve a corporation; or, without its consent, alter or amend its charter. In the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is declared that, 'No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any bills of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligations of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.' Under this clause, it has been settled that the charter of a private corporation, whether civil or eleemosynary, is an executed contract between the Government and the corporators; and that the Legislature cannot repeal, impair, or alter it against the consent, or without the default of the corporation judicially ascertained and declared. A distinction was, however, taken between private corporations and public, such as counties, cities, towns, and parishes, which, existing for public purposes only, the Legislature have, under proper limitations, a right to change, modify, enlarge, or restrain; securing, however, the property to the use of those for whom it was purchased."—Angel and Ames on Corporations.

That I understand to be the state of the law, for it is certainly sustained by an array of very high authorities.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman if he draws a distinction between that and my proposition of law?

Mr. MAYNARD. I believe that, as the gentleman has restated his proposition of law, it is susceptible of the same construction; but certainly there is a manifest distinction between what is stated by this commentator and what I understood the gentleman to insist upon yesterday. I conceive, then, that Congress has power legally to change the charter of the corporation of the city of Washington. Admitting that to be so, have they done it? Do they propose by this bill to do it? No, sir, not at all. The charter of the corporation is to be left standing exactly where it was. But we are told that there is a repealing section in this bill. Let me read it:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This section to take effect so soon as the chief shall report to the Secretary of the Interior that he has thirty men enrolled and ready for duty."

That repeals the act of 1842, and the subsequent acts referred to by the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia; but it does not touch the charter of the corporation of Washington. That stands exactly where it did. It stands with power in the civil authorities to appoint a police force, if they choose to do it. And then what state of things will you have? You will have two police forces, a city police and a national police. You will have them here at war with each other, like two rival fire companies; like the two police forces in the city of New York; like the new court system and the old court system in the State of Kentucky, a condition of active antagonism; or else you will have here a divided responsibility, which, in point of fact, is no responsibility at all. In either event, you will have a police force that will be utterly valueless.

Now, to bring what I have to say into a short compass, and to conclude, I will state what my proposition is. I am in favor of vesting the power of appointment in the Mayor of this city, elected as he is by the tax-payers permanently resident here. They have as high an interest as anybody in the preservation of the peace of the city. If they have an inefficient officer, they have the remedy in their own hands, at the ballot-box; which I have no doubt they will properly apply.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to make an inquiry, simply for information. The gentleman says that the Mayor is elected by the tax-payers. Does he mean to say that he is not elected by the electors at large, and that any property tax is required?

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will look to the charter of the city of Washington, which I have here in my hand, he will get the information which he desires. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the Mayor of the city would be the safest depository of this important and enormous power of appointment. But we are told that the present Mayor is a Democrat. So much the worse for him; but is he not interested, are not Democrats interested, in the preservation of the peace? Have they no lives? Have they no property to take care of? But it is said Democrats will be appointed to act as police. Suppose they are: hold them responsible; and if the Democrats do not administer your city government well, go to the ballot-box, that great palladium of all our rights, and the only one known to us under the Constitution, and apply the remedy. It has been stated upon this floor, and I have not heard it controverted, that there had been no complaints of the city police prior to the time of the present city administration, and that this is a mere temporary outbreak of villainy. Let the people have, at least, an opportunity to govern themselves, before you make them not only a subject but an abject race. Do not impose upon them a power, a control, that will take from them every vestige of self-respect which distinguishes the freeman from the bondman. But, if gentlemen are unwilling to trust this vast power and patronage alone in the hands of the Mayor elected by the tax-payers of the city, then I suggest that we unite with him one of the Federal functionaries of this District; unite with him the district attorney or the marshal for the District of Columbia, and let the Mayor and one of these officers constitute a board to appoint the chief of police, and let the chief of police hold his office at their discretion.

Now, I know that it is morally impossible for the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] who reported this bill, to intend anything covert, anything secret, anything concealed; and if he would speak in his place now, I know that he would say that nothing was further from his mind than to introduce a covert proposition here under which he could secure a little more present patronage to the party of which he is a most honorable and worthy member. I know that he intended no such thing. I suggest to him, then, that there are grave objections in my mind, and the minds of others, to the mode of appointment pointed out in the bill. I suggest to him the method that I have now proposed—either to confer it upon the Mayor of the city, as the act of 1842 does, or, if that is deemed insecure, and Federal interests would not be sufficiently protected, then associate with the Mayor the district attorney or the marshal of the district. I do not regard this chief of police in the light of a Federal officer. The whole thing is a mere municipal regulation. It is true that the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, giving him limited criminal jurisdiction, might seem to invest him with the dignity of a judicial officer; but I submit that it does not do it under well-settled principles. It is after all but a mere police regulation, and as such ought to be left under the control of the people who are most to be affected by it, and who are most directly interested in seeing it properly and judiciously carried out. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HUGHES obtained the floor.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Will the gentleman yield me the floor?

Mr. HUGHES. I will.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move that the committee rise, in order that we may take up the Kansas bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The notice given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday, was given without conference with my side of the House. I am perfectly willing, however, that the committee may rise and take the vote now.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being Senate bill "To establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject;" and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the Kansas bill.

No objection was made, and the bill was accordingly taken up.

The following message from the Senate, accompanying the bill, was then read:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 13, 1858.

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, and ask a conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the same.

Ordered, That Mr. GREEN, Mr. HUNTER, and Mr. SEWARD, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move that the House insist on their adherence, and on that question I call the previous question.

Mr. ENGLISH. I rise for the purpose of propounding to the Chair what I conceive to be a pertinent question. I desire to know whether, if a committee of conference should be ordered by the House, parliamentary law and practice would not require that the majority of that committee should be composed of gentlemen representing the views of the majority of the House; or, in other words, of gentlemen in favor of the House bill? I so understand the parliamentary law, and have never known it departed from. I submit the question to the Chair.

Mr. STANTON. If the interrogatory is not in order, I object to it, as it would lead to interrogatories upon the other side.

Mr. ENGLISH. I believe my question is in order.

Mr. GROW. There is no question of a committee of conference before the House.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I object to any interrogatory not in order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the interrogatory.

Mr. ENGLISH. Well, then, I wish to say that I have confidence in the Presiding Officer of this House; and believing the parliamentary law to be as I have indicated, and that the Speaker is of that opinion, it is my intention, if the motion for the previous question should be voted down, to move to accede to the Senate's request for a committee of conference.

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE demanded tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 107.

The Speaker voted in the negative.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish my action upon this occasion to be misunderstood. I therefore desire to say that I am very decidedly opposed to the Senate bill in its present shape, and do not think I could vote for it in any event. But, sir, notwithstanding I entertain this opinion, I am not prepared to say to a coördinate branch of the national Legislature that I am unwilling to hear them—that I am unwilling to confer with them upon a subject of great public interest. I think it is due to them, as a matter of courtesy and invariable parliamentary usage, that we should accede to their proposal, and that we should grant a committee of conference. Good may come of it; and, at all events, I cannot see that harm is likely to result. I therefore move that the House agree to the conference proposed by the Senate on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that three managers be appointed to manage said conference on the part of the House of Representatives; and I now call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. It is this: that it is not in order for the gentleman from Indiana to make that motion; that the House has adhered to its amendment upon this bill; and that, until the House reconsiders the motion by which it has thus adhered, it is not in order to make a motion of this kind. I think the Chair will not find a single precedent in which it has been held that a motion of this kind can be entertained upon the facts existing in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, and will cite the gentleman to a precedent directly in point, of very high authority.

The Clerk read the precedent, as follows:

"Journal of the Senate, January 20, 1834."

"A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Franklin, who informed the Senate that the House had agreed to the first, and had disagreed to the second amendment to the bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834.

"On motion of Mr. Webster, the Senate proceeded to consider the foregoing message from the House, announcing the disagreement of the House to the second amendment to said bill; and, on motion of Mr. Webster, the Senate adhered to the second amendment—yeas 34, nays 13; and the Secretary notified the House of the vote to adhere.

"Whereupon, January 24, the House asked a conference. The Senate referred the request for a conference to the Committee on Finance; and Mr. Webster made the following report:

"The House request a conference after the Senate has adhered to its amendments, to which the House has previously disagreed. It cannot be denied that the Senate has a right to refuse such conference; a case exactly similar having been disposed of by the Senate in 1827, as will be seen by the extracts from its Journal which are appended to this report. (vide Senate Document, No. 57.) But the committee think it equally clear that such is not the usual and ordinary mode of proceeding in such cases. It is usually esteemed more respectful and more conducive to that good understanding and harmonious intercourse between the Houses which the public interest so strongly requires, to accede to requests for conferences even after an adhering vote. Such conferences have long been regarded as the established and approved mode of seeking to bring about a final concurrence of judgment in cases where the Houses have differed; and the committee think it unwise either to depart from the practice altogether, or to abridge it, or decline to conform to it, in cases such as those in which it has usually prevailed. It should only be, therefore, as the committee think, in instances of a very peculiar character, that a free conference invited by the House should be declined by the Senate. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate agree to the conference proposed by the House of Representatives, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendments; and that three managers be chosen to manage said conference on the part of the Senate."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I give notice that I object to debate. The previous question has been demanded, and no debate is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that in a collection of precedents of order; he will find perhaps fifteen or twenty precedents exactly similar; and that at the last session of Congress the precedents that have been uniformly pursued were followed in the case of the Army bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think there is no precedent like this; and if there be no objection on the other side, I wish to state the reasons.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall object to debate on this question after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Indiana withdraw for a moment his demand for the previous question?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to know whether the rules are to be enforced or not?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GARNETT. I request my friend from Indiana to withdraw his demand for the previous question, to allow me to make an explanation of the vote which I intend to give.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object, unless the privilege be general.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have been very urgently appealed to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] to withdraw the call for the previous question for a moment, to enable him to explain his position. I design doing so, but I intend to hold on to the floor.

Mr. BUFFINTON and others objected.

Mr. ENGLISH. I withdraw the call for the previous question for the purpose of saying that I have made this proposition to accede to the request for a committee of conference, with the distinct understanding that the usage of this body and the usage of all parliamentary bodies, require that when a committee of this sort is allowed—

[Calls to order.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I trust that if the gentleman make a speech, he will allow us to reply to it. If we are to have this question open at all let us have it investigated fully. We are ready for it.

Mr. ENGLISH. I am not going to make a speech. I am only stating this in my own justification: that I have made this motion because I understand it to be the invariable rule that where committees of conference are appointed, the committee shall be so constituted as that the majority of the committee shall represent the views of a majority of the House; and that in this case a majority of this committee of conference would be taken from the anti-Lecompton side of the House. That this will be the action of the Speaker in the present case I feel well assured. Now, if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] will renew the call for the previous question, I will yield the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can occupy the floor himself, but he cannot allow another gentleman to occupy it if objection be made. Objection is made.

Mr. ENGLISH. I think I can get at the matter which the gentleman from Virginia desires to bring before the House by propounding a question to him.

Several MEMBERS. I object.

Mr. GARNETT. I withdraw my request at the instance of gentlemen around me. I believe my vote will be understood.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

Mr. STANTON. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have the floor, and I have a right to ask a question.

Mr. STANTON. I submit that the gentleman has no right to interrogate a member.

The SPEAKER. If objections be made, the Chair is of opinion that the gentleman cannot interrogate other members, unless it be with regard to a personal explanation; and nothing has transpired to authorize that.

Mr. ENGLISH. I understand well that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] is against the House amendment, but I am a little curious to know whether the gentleman would vote for the Senate bill if it were modified in any respect whatever.

Mr. WARREN and others objected.

Mr. GARNETT. I will vote against the Senate bill if any further concession be made.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] does not take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY], which is an affirmative proposition that we adhere to our amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to present a counter proposition after the House refused to second the previous question. It comes up in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the effect of sustaining the previous question be to bring us to a vote, first on the proposition to grant a conference, and next on the proposition to adhere?

The SPEAKER. It will be the effect of it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL called for the yeas and nays on Mr. ENGLISH's motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, John B. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—108.

The Speaker voted in the affirmative.

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BISHOP stated that Mr. ARNOLD had paired off with Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin.

Mr. FENTON stated that Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE had paired off with Mr. SICKLES.

Mr. CORNING stated that he had paired off with Mr. OLIN, who had been called home.

Mr. DICK. On Thursday last I paired off with Mr. WHITELEY, of Delaware, till twelve o'clock yesterday. As I have been told that his understanding was, that the pair was for an indefinite period, I would call upon my colleague, Mr. RITCHIE, to state his understanding of the matter.

Mr. RITCHIE. I understood that the pair was from Thursday last till Tuesday. Whether there was any subsequent conference I do not know. That was the pair made in my presence.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to say that, at the request of Mr. WHITELEY, I effected a pair with Mr. DICK, and that it expired yesterday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. MONTGOMERY stated that Mr. ADRAIN had paired off with Mr. HUYLER.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that Mr. DIMMICK had paired off with Mr. MCKIBBIN.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES stated that Mr. GILIS had paired off with Mr. ROBBINS.

Mr. PURVIANCE stated that Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, had paired off with Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana.

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that Mr. REILLY had paired off with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that he had paired off with Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, otherwise he would have voted ay.

On the vote being announced, there was some applause in the Hall and in the galleries.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will take his assistants to the gallery, and remove every person who has so far forgotten himself, and the place where he is, as to make this disturbance.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. One word on this question of clearing the galleries. I hope that, at least, an example will be set on this floor, before the galleries are taken into consideration. I think we ought to rebuke ourselves before we rebuke others.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware that any demonstration had been made on the floor of the House. The Chair thinks such demonstrations are exceedingly improper, come from what quarter they may. The Chair has no right to order the House to be cleared for disorder; but he has a right to order the galleries to be cleared. If the gentleman will bring to the attention of the House a violation of order by any gentleman, the Chair has no doubt that the House will take such action as may be necessary in the premises.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER, (to the officers who were engaged in clearing the galleries.) The Chair did not order the galleries to be cleared entirely; but to clear them of such persons as were guilty of disorder.

Mr. CURTIS. I propose that the execution of the order be arrested. The demonstration was a slight one.

The SPEAKER. Hoping that the disorder will not be repeated in the galleries, and certain that if any demonstration occurred on the floor of the House it will not be repeated, the Chair revokes the order to the Doorkeeper to clear the galleries, expecting that visitors, who come here and enjoy the privilege of listening to the debates of the House, will not violate its decorum and order.

Mr. GROW. I hope the Speaker does not consider it a privilege that men shall come here and listen to the debates. They should observe order. But I object to the form in which the Chair puts it—that it is a privilege for American citizens to sit in the gallery. If they observe the rules it is their right.

The SPEAKER. It is unquestionably a privilege.

Mr. GROW. It is also their right.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask if their privileges are not their rights?

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton, Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Garrett, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Trippe, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—108.

The Speaker voted in the affirmative.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The question recurred on agreeing to Mr. MONTGOMERY's proposition as amended; and it was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. STANTON. There is some misunderstanding here. I do not understand what the proposition is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to reconsider the vote by which the proposition was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. So I understand. But what was the proposition agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The proposition originally made by the gentleman Pennsylvania, as amended by the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STANTON. I did not understand that that was an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair received it as an amendment. The Chair is not certain but that it might have been entertained as an independent proposition.

Mr. STANTON. I supposed it was an independent proposition.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I would inquire whether the gentleman from Indiana moved his proposition as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated at the time, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to know how the words in the original proposition remain to be voted on?

The SPEAKER. It has been all disposed of except the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, to reconsider and lay on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. LETCHER. In order to allow our friend from Kentucky to ascertain how it is, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GOODE. I ask my colleague to withdraw that motion for one moment.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw it.

CORRECTION.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single correction? In the report of my remarks made yesterday I am reported as saying that a person was appointed on the auxiliary guard, after an attempt by him to commit murder, and before his arrest. I did not intend to say that he had been appointed after the commission of the crime. It was a misapprehension entirely.

WASHINGTON AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. GOODE. I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill of the Senate, No. 232, establishing an auxiliary guard, shall cease at the next rising of the committee—the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia having the privilege to close the debate at the next sitting of the committee; and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending or offered to the same, and shall report it to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As I understand the resolution, it provides that the gentleman from Virginia shall have the privilege of closing the debate. He has that right already, under the rule.

Mr. GOODE. If that be the understanding, I am willing to modify the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it is a Senate bill, not reported by the gentleman from Virginia, and therefore he would not have that right under the rule.

Mr. STANTON. Is the debate to be closed after we shall again go into committee?

Mr. GOODE. Yes.

Mr. STANTON. If the House adjourn now, I have no objection; but if the debate is to close to-day, I think that that is not allowing time enough.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to hear that part of the resolution read again which pertains to amendments. I do not understand whether amendments are cut off by it or not.

The SPEAKER. No amendments can be cut off by a resolution of this sort in the House. This is the usual language in which resolutions to close debate are clothed.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GOODE. I accept the modification of the resolution to close debate when the committee rises to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot modify his resolution pending a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. What do I understand to be the modification?

Mr. GOODE. To terminate debate at the rising of the committee to-morrow.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. Then I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask leave to introduce, for reference, a bill to divide the State of New York into three judicial districts.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to establish an for the city of Washington; on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] was entitled to the floor.

AUXILIARY GUARD

Mr. HUGHES (in the noise and confusion of the House) was understood to say: I wish to speak to the question before the committee as a practical question now before us for legislative action. There are four propositions before us.

Mr. BOWIE. I move that the committee rise. There is too much confusion to proceed.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES, (resuming.) I was saying there were four propositions before the committee: one is the bill of the Senate; the second is an amendment proposed to that bill by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD]; the third is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE], the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia; and the fourth a proposition from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LETCHER].

The general features of all these different propositions are nearly alike, differing in one particular only, and that is, in reference to the manner in which the proposed police force shall be appointed. The Senate bill proposes that the chief of police shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I lay some emphasis upon the last part of that proposition, because it appears to have been wholly overlooked in this debate, up to the present time, that the Senate were to have any voice in that matter. The captain, the lieutenants, and the men, according to the Senate bill, are to be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and they may be removed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of said Secretary.

Now, sir, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD], and which appears to find favor at least with some of the leaders upon the other side of the House, proposes to vest the power of appointing this police in a board composed of four commissioners, to be elected in such a manner as to secure to the two political parties a balance of power in the board; and to keep up that arrangement from time to time at each ensuing election. The bill reported by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE], the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, is almost the same as the Senate bill. The most important difference is this: the bill of the gentleman from Virginia confers upon the chief of police the power of holding a court, which is not in the Senate bill. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LETCHER] proposes to vest the appointment of this police force in three commissioners named in the amendment, who are to be appointed from time to time by joint resolution of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the great expenditure of the public money in the city of Washington, in the erection of public buildings, in the embellishment of the city, and for other purposes, has created in the city, I believe, a disposition to fasten upon the national Treasury all the burdens incident to the management of its municipal affairs. This is to be guarded against; and I confess that when it was first proposed to go further than we have heretofore gone, and to establish, at the expense of the national Treasury, a sort of municipal government for this city, in addition to that already established, the proposition struck me unfavorably. But, sir, upon further examination, I am disposed to think that it is the duty of Congress to pass a law of the character of one of the bills now under consideration. I desire that some one of these bills shall pass; and it is for the purpose of urging upon the committee such considerations as have presented themselves to my mind, why such a law should pass, that I now speak.

I find, upon examination, that the policy here proposed in reference to the establishment of an auxiliary police force for this city, is not a new policy. That policy has already been adopted. Congress has heretofore provided for such an establishment, and is now maintaining one at the public expense. The Senate bill comes to us commended by the vote of the Senate, only nine members of that body having recorded their votes against it. And, as it seems to me it has been attempted in the progress of this discussion, to give a party character to this measure, it may not be improper for me to say that this was not a party measure in the Senate, there being only nine votes against it. There was no party vote. I may say, also, that the Senate bill—because it is almost identical with the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE], the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia—comes to us with the sanction of the unanimous adoption of it by the House Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me, as one of the members of that committee, to explain my position?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I was not present in the committee when it committed itself to that bill, and I am opposed to the bill in the shape in which it was reported by the committee. I have an amendment to offer to it.

Mr. GOODE. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, that the bill was concurred in by all the members of that committee who were present. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was not present.

Mr. HUGHES. It appears, then, that the House bill comes here sanctioned by every member of the committee who was present, the gentleman from Pennsylvania not being there. Upon that committee I observe the name of the gentleman from New York, who offers an amendment to the Senate bill; and it strikes me as worthy of remark that an amendment of that character should be offered, radically differing in the mode of appointing this police, by a gentleman who had already given his full sanction to the measure which the chairman of the committee reported. The bill comes from that committee without any Executive recommendation. It is not sent here by the President, nor recommended by him. I say, then, that the Senate bill, or the bill of the Committee for the District of Columbia, comes to us as no party measure; but comes to us commended by the overwhelming consent of all parties in the Senate, and by the representatives of all parties of the committee of the House.

Sir, let me inquire—because it becomes necessary to advert to the partisan views which have been brought to bear in the discussion of this subject—how was this bill received in this House? Why, sir, I believe when the chairman of the committee first brought it to the attention of the House, my colleague from Indiana [Mr. COLFAX] who sits on the other side of the House, suggested that there might be a difficulty upon the subject unless some guarantee could be given by the chairman of the committee that this would not be made “a partisan police;” and immediately after, the senior member from the State of Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] declared that he could not give his consent to any measure of this kind, because this body of police would be used to catch negroes who were out late at night, or would in other ways interfere with the colored population of this District. Well, this was the first indication in the House of opposition to this measure. Gentlemen had doubts at first, but the gentleman from Ohio stepped out boldly and led off in a party opposition to the measure; and it is useless to deny the fact that when he leads, and where he leads, others follow. Directly, in the progress of this debate, after hearing that from the gentleman from Ohio, we hear a sort of philosophical disquisition upon the causes of the demoralization in the state of society existing at the capital from his colleague, [Mr. STANTON.] He traces all the evils to the practical application of the maxim “to the victors belong the spoils.” He bases his opposition to the Senate bill, and to the bill of the committee, exclusively upon the ground that they vest the appointing power in the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. And, finally, he gave us his idea of a measure for the establishment of a police here independent of party feeling, and that is the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD.]

Sir, it is very much to be regretted, because it may affect the vote on this question, that any discussion of a party character should have sprung up upon this bill. I merely allude to these things to show that, if the discussion of this measure takes that direction, the responsibility does not rest with those who are advocating it. This is the capital of the nation, over which, by express provision of the Constitution, Congress has exclusive jurisdiction—exclusive power; and where the power is, there is the responsibility also. The responsibility follows the power, and is as inseparable from it as the shadow from the substance. Congress, then, is responsible for wholesome legislation for the District of Columbia.

What is the object of government? It is to protect the people in their personal liberty, their personal security, and their rights of private property. Until this is done, Congress has failed to do its duty. This city being under the immediate supervision of Congress, the national capital, visited by representatives from every foreign Power with which we have diplomatic relations, ought to be the model of a well-governed city. There ought to be perfect security for life and property here. It ought to be so orderly; that not only could strong men, capable of self-defense, pass through the streets in the day time and in the night time without fear of molestation, but that women and children could go about without apprehension.

What is the actual condition of this city? Why, it is an admitted fact that murder stalks abroad, and goes unwhipt of justice. Assassination after assassination is committed—robbery after robbery. There is no security for life or property. And these admitted evils appeal to the national Legislature for a proper remedy. It seems to me that, except as to such differences of opinion as will spring up about the details of a measure, there ought to be no controversy at all about the propriety and expediency of passing the proposed law. Yet it is obvious that it meets with serious opposition. I propose now to notice some of the objections which are made to it.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who, it is said, is an able lawyer, made an able speech against it. He is an able lawyer. He talks like a lawyer. He talked like a lawyer upon this bill. He talked like a criminal lawyer—like one who is in the habit of defending criminals. I have seen a great many able criminal lawyers, and I tell you now that the legislation of this country will attest the fact that they are very poor legislators for the prevention of crime; they are the most unreliable men on the face of earth to pass laws for the prevention of crime. The gentleman asked, "Why interfere with the Mayor?" Did the gentleman know, when he made that objection, that the very measure now before us, which the Senate has passed, was suggested and mapped out in a letter from the Mayor of the city, which was published in the proceedings of the Senate on this bill, and in suggestions from the chief of the small police force now employed? "Why," he asked, "interfere with the Mayor? June is coming, when a new election will take place, and perhaps the people may elect a better man." June is coming! Sir, there are those now mouldering in the earth, and perhaps there will be more, if Congress fails to afford protection to this District, to whom June never will come. Will the people of this city, in the June election, elect a Mayor who will call back the dead; who will restore to life the murdered citizens of the Republic, who failed to receive that protection to which they were entitled? Will they elect a Mayor who will overtake the malefactors, and bring them to justice? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEITER] said, the other day, that there were only two murders a day on an average, or perhaps one and a half a day, and he thought we could stand that for a few days, till the House could proceed to the consideration of this bill as a special order. Can we stand it until June? Can the people stand it until June? Will this House do its duty, if it permits the existing state of things to continue until June?

Now, sir, in regard to the guarantee that this will not be a party police, I have to say upon that subject, if any guarantee is needed, if any one has a right to demand such a guarantee—a right which I do not admit—that if gentlemen will refer to the published debates of the Senate upon this bill, they will find that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia in that body made the statement, that if the bill passed it was his understanding and that of his colleagues, that they would wait upon the President and inform him that any nomination of a partisan character for chief of police that might be sent to the Senate, would not be confirmed by that body if they could prevent it. That is going a great way. That is giving a guarantee beyond what any man has a right to demand. The distinguished leader of the Republican party, the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and other Senators who voted for the bill, saw nothing in it going to establish a pretorian guard or to subvert the Constitution. But here, in this House, we are met with the cry of party. Nothing can be done for fear that party favorites will be rewarded. There is a great difference between a pretorian guard—a standing army with power to put up the Republic at auction, like the pretorian guard of Rome—and a civic police consisting of one hundred men. Some gentlemen say that the number is too large; but this is the number fixed upon as necessary by the Mayor, in the letter to which I have referred.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

At this point the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKEY, its chief clerk, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House, that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on the first Monday in June next, at one o'clock, p. m.

[Cries of "Good!" "Good!"]

The committee then resumed its session.

WASHINGTON POLICE BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. HUGHES. The announcement just made admonishes me to be brief, and I will endeavor to be so.

Now, sir, I wish to say a word or two upon the main point in this discussion—the power of appointment—to show the reasons why, in my opinion, the appointing power had better be vested where this bill vests it, in the President and Senate, than in commissioners in the manner proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DOBB,] or in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER.] The President is the representative of this whole nation, the head of the Federal Government, chosen by the people; and the presumption is that he would be the proper person to appoint these officers, because they ought to be appointed by some power capable of unity of will and speedy action. The Senate has a proper check upon him. Do gentlemen mean seriously to tell the House, when the President and the Senate have the appointment of all the judicial officers under the Federal Government, of all the ministers to foreign nations, and of all the important Federal officers of the country, that it would be dangerous to trust them with the appointment of a chief of police for the city of Washington? Is that the idea—that it would corrupt them to trust them with this power? If that be true, the Government has certainly fallen very low indeed; and it is a reflection not only upon Presidents and Senates, present and to come, but upon the people of the whole United States, who have recently expressed their choice of a President, the remonstrances and arguments of most of the gentlemen who oppose this bill for this reason, to the contrary, notwithstanding.

Now, sir, I think I could demonstrate that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOBB] is incapable of being put in practice, and that its provisions would defeat its object, because it recognizes two parties only, and two sets of candidates to be voted for, when the people of this District may divide into any number of parties. But admitting that it will accomplish the object which its friends propose: I say that it establishes and recognizes upon its face a vicious principle of legislation, and one which no Congress ought to recognize or embody in the forms of law. It recognizes that this country is to be controlled by parties. It proposes solemnly to pass a law which shall recognize the existence of two parties, and give them power each to select two of a board of commissioners, three of whom are required to perform any act. What would be the consequence? Why, sir, the board would generally be tied when they came to a vote. If it be true, as the amendment assumes, that the people and public functionaries will recognize a duty higher than the duty they owe to protect life and property, and preserve the peace, how will this board act? Let us suppose a case. An election is approaching, in which these two parties recognized in the amendment are contending. It is important that the police should be so regulated as to act fairly and impartially towards all parties. These police commissioners, representing the two parties, come together. At the very moment, perhaps, when they ought to act in union and harmony, they differ, and, as a consequence, no action is taken by the board; the public peace is unprotected for, and the lives of citizens are unprotected. What is the object of that amendment? Why, it is palpable upon its face that, so far from preventing the appointment of a partisan police, its object is to make one. The gentlemen are opposed to allowing the President to appoint the police, because he will make it a partisan police; but if you will give them the power to put men of their own party on the board, it will be all right.

Now, sir, I am opposed to a purely partisan police. I do not propose to recognize any party in any law which I shall vote for, or to divide between parties the public patronage. I would rather depend upon the President and the Senate of the United States to appoint these functionaries, than upon any such board as that proposed, even if it could work harmoniously and expeditiously. And whenever the time comes when the President and Senate—I care not to what party they belong—become so corrupt that they cannot provide by appointment for the police of this city, it will be useless to look further for honest men and honest functionaries within the limits of this Republic.

A great deal has been said about corruption during the present session. It seems as though no bill can be introduced but discussion takes that direction. In regard to that, I concur in what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] If all this corruption exists in the departments of the Government, certainly some specific case can be pointed out. Here is the grand inquest for the presentation of the charge; and a member of this House, knowing of the truth of such a charge, who does not bring it before this House, and propose articles of impeachment, is himself delinquent, and the corruption is with him. Sir, self-respect, respect for our own Government and our own people ought to forbid this continual stream of offensive charges based upon common rumor, and sometimes not even upon that, but upon the evil imaginations of bad men.

I say that it occurs to me that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOBB] will totally fail to provide an efficient police for this city. As to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER,] I think that it is a much fairer proposition; and if we must compromise amongst these different propositions in order to pass some law to afford protection to the people of this city, as we have compromised about many other things, I should infinitely prefer that proposition to the other. The difficulty about it is this: the commissioners are named in the bill; and unless members have a personal knowledge of these men they must take them on the faith of what others represent. If Congress is to appoint men by name, they should be elected and the field should be open to all. Another objection is this: they are to be appointed every two years by joint resolution. Now, sir, it may be a long time before the Senate and the House could concur in a joint resolution on the same three men; and that defect in the law may defeat its operation altogether.

What is the history of this matter? This city once had an efficient and a valuable police, the chief of which was appointed by the President. This was many years ago. While that system lasted there were security and order in the city. When it was broken down, and the appointing power was taken from the President and given to the Mayor of the city, where it is at present vested, then the disorders began, and they have never ceased since.

It is said that the right of self-government is denied to the people of this District by the Senate bill. I deny it. Congress is the constitutional law-making power for this people; and so long as they are governed under the Constitution of the United States, of which country they are citizens, they are governed in the proper way. But suppose that it did take away the right of self-government: does the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York give them that right? Very far from it; for if the people should, with perfect unanimity, desire the election of four individuals at the first election, they cannot get them. No man has the right to vote for more than two, and consequently the citizens are disfranchised as to one half the board at each election. The commission must be a party one. It is true that the parties will be equally balanced.

I propose to look at the theory of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.] He must be a lawyer, and a criminal lawyer. I believe that it is a common expression, when great crimes have been committed, for counsel and others to get up what they call "a theory of the offense." The gentleman has his theory, and it is this: that the demoralization and corruption of society in Washington has taken place in consequence of the maxim that "to the victors belong the spoils." He is opposed to any patronage being dispensed on party grounds. I do not wish to say anything in answer to the gentleman's theory, but I will propose a theory myself, that will not go back as far as the year 1844, to hunt up disturbances at the polls, that will, I think, come nearer to the truth than the gentleman's theory. I have heard of another maxim, very rare, very frequently pronounced—a sort of political shibboleth, that was in everybody's mouth a few years ago, but seems to have passed away. I allude to that great doctrine which was going to overturn all parties, and be the foundation of a new order of things, that "Americans should rule America." I think that most of the disorders at elections, and political demoralization in the capital, are to be traced to that maxim, and the doings proceeding from those banded together to carry it out. It may be that the gentleman, in the course of his political experience, has regarded that maxim with great favor.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has great fear, great apprehension, of pretorian guards. He does not like that the people of the country should be interfered with in their innocent diversions. He supposes that these one hundred policemen will overrun the country and will eventually put up the Government for sale, like the pretorian guards of ancient Rome. We are all very apt to bring with us from home our standards of right and wrong, politically and otherwise. I suppose that the gentleman is entirely satisfied with the standard of order that exists in his own city of Louisville, and I have no disposition to quarrel with him on that subject; he has a right to his opinion; but the peculiar condition of his city is a matter of public history. If it be true, then, that this is his standard of a well-governed city, and that he squares his ideas of municipal government according to the order that prevails there, his opposition to this bill is an argument in its favor rather than against it.

Mr. Chairman, I hold it to be the duty of this Congress to pass some law. I am not particular about its form. Rather than vote against any law, I would vote to give the commissioners to the party which holds the other side of this House, for I am not so uncharitable as to believe that it has not an abundance of good men to appoint for the discharge of responsible duties. All public functionaries are more or less elected on party grounds. Does that disqualify them? I regard it as an objection that judicial officers are so elected; and for standing out against the doctrine of the election of the judiciary on party grounds, I brought upon my political record the dreadful blemish that is occasionally cast up to me by those who in the same breath complain of attempts to read them out of the Democratic party. But so it is that judicial and all other officers are elected. Their election is, to a greater or less extent, influenced by their politics.

But that is not the only consideration, I hope and trust, which weighs in their selection, or would govern the appointment of policemen for this city. I say that the life of any citizen of these United States is, with me, above all party, and above all price. Ay, sir, the life of any foreigner who may perchance have forsaken his distant home to come to this boasted land of liberty, in pursuance of the invitations in our constitutions and laws, and who places himself under the protection of those constitutions and laws—the life of that man, and his protection while here, are, with me, above all party and above all price. Whether he be Protestant or Catholic, Irishman or German, native-born or foreigner, the fact that he stands upon the national soil of these United States and in the District where the seat of Government is located, should be a shield as potent for his protection, as were the words, "I am a Roman citizen," to the countrymen of Cicero. It should throw around him a wall of security. It is the duty of this body to lay aside party and all other considerations that stand in the way of producing just that kind of security under the law within this city and this District; and I believe that the bill of the Senate is eminently calculated to produce that result. I believe that the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia will answer that purpose; and so I believe with reference to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

I think, sir, that it is a small compliment to give to the President of the United States the appointment of a chief of police in his own city. It is to be regarded, I presume, as a small addition to his patronage. But I will not vote against any reasonable proposition which has for its object to afford peace and protection to the people here, because it takes away patronage from the President. If it be the pleasure of the House to prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEITER] I will go for that. But I will never vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD] or any other that has stamped upon its face the word party, or recognizes the existence of party.

Mr. Chairman, I, of course, except from anything I have said in regard to political partisan speeches, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] who last addressed the committee, and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN.] I see nothing of that character in what they said. I do protest, however, against such language as was used by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMINS.] He talked about this "corrupt, repudiated Administration." A corrupt Administration! Who says that it is corrupt? Let us come to the point. Who says that this is a corrupt Administration? Do gentlemen propose to answer in the affirmative? Very well. Where is the corruption? Do you know of it? Can you point it out? If so, the people have sent you here as a grand jury, under the Constitution of the United States, and it is your duty to present that corruption. Do your duty, if others do not.

Mr. STANTON. One thing at a time.

Mr. HUGHES. And one election at a time; and when you are beaten, try again. Begin in time, and manufacture capital enough for the next canvass. When a Republican House of Representatives was in session here, a national convention of that party met and gravely arraigned a Democratic Administration on charges of murder, arson, and divers other offenses. Many gentlemen who occupied seats upon this floor at that time, were members of that convention, and presented that indictment to the people of the United States in their party platform, and had the Democratic Administration tried on it. The verdict was "not guilty," as they well knew it would be. Not one of those sworn Representatives dared stand up in his place upon this floor and make the charge of complicity with murder or arson against any public functionary who could be reached by process of impeachment from this House. I say, in regard to all these things, "evil be to him that evil thinks." It is not the first man that cries out corruption who is the purest.

I desire to be understood distinctly as assailing the motives and integrity of no man on this floor or elsewhere. I have no design of that kind, and merely repel what I deem an unfounded and unnecessary charge—a charge calculated to have a prejudicial effect upon measures before us for legislative action.

I shall give my support, sir, first, to the Senate bill; second, to the bill of the House, as reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia; and, if neither of these be adopted, then to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER.] Under no circumstances shall I vote for, and I hope the House will never pass, such a proposition as the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD.]

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman yields I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from New York does not desire to speak this evening, I hope he will allow me the floor for a few minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. If I can have the floor in the morning I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the gentleman can retain his right to the floor, and let the gentleman from Texas proceed this evening.

There was no objection.

Mr. REAGAN. It is my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to vote against the bill now under consideration in all its forms; and as the principles of the bill in some form have received the sanction of nearly all the other branches of the National Legislature, and as the discussion in this committee, and especially on the Republican side of the House, has had a tendency towards making it a party question here, I desire to make a few remarks.

A few days ago, Mr. Chairman, I, with a number of other gentlemen, was read out of the Democratic party.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, you got back safe this morning.

Mr. REAGAN. I was going to say that I apprehend it will require the Washington Union to read me out of the Democratic party once, at least, in three days, to keep me out of it. I am going to vote on this measure as I did on the deficiency bill, upon my judgment and my convictions. I tried to get an opportunity to state the reasons why I would vote against the deficiency bill, but under the rules of the House I could not do so. I shall, however, if I get an opportunity, hereafter state those reasons, in order that that paper which professes to be the organ of the Democratic party, may not, on false statements, manufactured by itself, send the intelligence to my people, that I am out of the Democratic party. I understand that as this bill is a special order, in committee, I cannot do so now. I must seek an opportunity hereafter.

As I am read out of the party because I would not give my sanction to the voting of a gratuity of $72,000 to certain officers of this House, for services for which they were paid, and as my view of this question is, that it is but another of the list of plunder measures, I suppose I will be in danger, if I refuse again to vote away money uselessly to pension the lobby members and loafers in the House and in the city of Washington, of being again read out of the Democratic party.

Besides my unwillingness to be read out of the Democratic party, I have some objections in principle, which, to my mind, are insuperable obstacles in the way of voting for this bill. We, sir, recognize in the American theory of Government that the people are capable of self-government. This bill, in principle, denies the fact that the people of the city of Washington are capable of self-government. The people of this city have their charter; it is an incorporated city; it has its judges; it has its magistrates; it has its constables; it has its city police; it has its body of laws. Why then, sir, is not life and property secure here? The reason has perhaps been given by some members on this floor, as existing in the worthlessness, corruption, and inefficiency of the magistracy of the city of Washington. I need not be told they are Democratic justices of the peace, or that they are Republican justices of the peace, or that it is Democratic law, or Republican law, under which the city is governed; I know of no such distinctions in law.

If another reason is desired why life and property are insecure in this city, let any gentleman start from this Capitol, and walk the length of Pennsylvania avenue, and ask the peaceable and law-abiding citizens of this city why life and property are insecure, and they will tell you that, if a citizen is knocked down, or if he is stabbed, or if he is shot, by one of these States-hose gentlemen, or one of the Plug Uglies, who ruled Baltimore till they got tired, and then came to Washington to rule it, the offender may perhaps be taken up, and perhaps not. He may be taken before one of these magistrates, and there, as is asserted, he gives straw-bail, as it is called, and goes at large. The individual is wronged and injured; the community is wronged and injured. The officer has violated his duty and the law by not enforcing the law. And now, since the courts of the corporation have become so inefficient and corrupt as no longer to afford security to life and property, the people come here to the Congress of this nation, and ask us to appropriate $100,000 to create an auxiliary police force to give security to the city. That will have for effect to pension over one hundred more hungry office-seekers, and make that many more leeches to suck the life-blood of the Government. And, sir, when this is done, will the administration of the law be more pure? Will life be more secure? Will property be better protected? These questions may be well asked. I apprehend that the effect of it will only be adding to that corruption which is now witnessed. The accumulation of offices, and the extravagant expenditure of the public money, are the bane of the city of Washington.

Sir, while I do not desire to reflect on any one, it cannot well escape the attention of members that there are a great many men from different States of the Union residing in the city of Washington, who have not the honesty and industry to labor for a living, who have not the skill to obtain a living in some honorable profession; but who come here to ask for public employment. I do not mean by that to say that all who come here for offices are of that description of men. Many of them are not obnoxious to this charge. But the remark that many persons were obnoxious to it, I hold will be regarded as true by most persons who have witnessed how things are conducted here. And these men—more than one hundred of them—are now to be pensioned upon the public Treasury, if this bill is to become a law, and that, too, in violation of the great fundamental principle in our theory of government—that the people are capable of self-government. Here, sir, as I said before, you have your city magistracy, its officers, and corporation, the President of the United States, the heads of Departments, with an army of officers around them; you have your navy-yard, its officers and men, the arsenal, the Smithsonian Institution, the observatory, the laborers upon the public grounds; in fact, you have a city of offices and officeholders, under the protection of the Government—under the protection of the city; and yet you come here with a bill to pension more than a hundred leeches, who desire to be fed by the public.

Now, sir, the day this Congress passes an act to protect the lives and property of the people of this city, you declare, in substance, that the people of Washington are no longer capable of self-government. Is not that true?

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which confers upon Congress exclusive legislative power over this District, the people are not governing themselves according to the Constitution when Congress passes the law? Is there any other way for them to govern themselves?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not deny the constitutional authority of Congress to pass this bill. It is with me but a question of expediency. Congress has, by the Constitution, the exclusive right to legislate for this city. It has done what seems to me right under our system of government, in giving this city a charter to enable it to govern itself. And I here remark, that whenever the Government, independently of the means furnished by the city for its own protection, attempts by the expenditure of public money to protect the lives and property of the people of the city of Washington, it commits an anomalous act, for which there is no parallel found in any State of the Union. It has not been long since we heard of murders, arsons, and outrages in the cities of Baltimore, Louisville, and New Orleans, and a little further back, in Cincinnati, and many other places. Did the Legislatures of those respective States think of providing, at the expense of the State, a police to keep in due order the citizens of either of those cities? Never; and simply for the reason that the Legislature had done all that duty required them to do; had done all that was consistent with the principle of self-government when they granted charters to those cities, and authorized them to govern themselves.

It seems to me it is all that it is the duty of Congress to do in this case to give to the city such liberal legislation as will enable the people to govern themselves. If they have become so sunk in corruption, so lost to all pride of character as American citizens, as not to be capable of self-government, let them move out into the country, where the people are capable of self-government. They are not bound to stay here. The prime object of this bill—and I mean no imputation upon any member of the committee or of the House—is not to secure protection here. The prime object is to secure the expenditure of public money. I believe, though we now call it an auxiliary police force for the city of Washington, a year or two hence it will be a police bureau, and the next a police department; and that, instead of appropriating $100,000, as now proposed, Congress will, to benefit its partisans, appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars a few years hence.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire very much to remove the gentleman's objection, and I will state that this measure has not been petitioned for by the people of Washington; that the bill of the Senate originated in a resolution of the Senate, and the bill of the House in a resolution of the House. If there is any desire to plunder, that desire must originate in one or the other branch of Congress, and not with the people of Washington.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not aware that any formal petition has been made by the citizens of Washington to either the Senate or the House of Representatives, but I venture this statement: if you go among loafers of Washington city, or among those who want public employment, every one of them in the city who thinks he can get to be a policeman, is an earnest advocate of this bill; that all the lobby members of this House who expect to be chief of police or lieutenants, are anxious for the passage of this bill. I conceive that the people of this city, good people, too, honest people who have property here, desire protection, and if Congress will protect them in this way they will not object. They will, of course, get all the money they can. They would rather Congress should defray the expenses of their police out of the money of the people of the United States, than to pay for their own self-government. And that is one of the great objections to this bill. Why tax the people of the State of Texas and of Maine to pay the expenses of the police regulations of the city of Washington? Where is the justice of this? Why do this at the expense of the great principle of self-government, by virtually declaring that this people are no longer capable of self-government? They are perhaps willing to submit to the degradation in order to get the money, but they cannot sell themselves to me in that way.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman was understood to say that the chief and primary object of this bill was the expenditure of money.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it probable that I made use of some such expression; but I did not mean—

Mr. GOODE. I wish the gentleman to designate the particular gentleman to whom he intends to apply the remark.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will wait, I will make such an explanation as will be satisfactory. I may not have qualified my remark as I ought. I did not intend to impute to the honorable chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, nor to any member of the committee, nor to any member of the House who may vote for this bill, any such motive of action. I meant to say that the great outdoor pressure originates in that motive. I believe it. I may be mistaken; but I am quite sure I am not wholly mistaken.

I believe I have stated all the grounds of objection to this bill that I intended to state; and I hope I shall not be read out of the Democratic party for voting against this reckless expenditure of money—for I presume the bill will pass here as it did in the Senate—as I was read out for voting against the deficiency bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to address the committee on this bill—

Mr. PEYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am willing to go on now. I believe that the committee is willing to hear me, and the quicker we dispatch this discussion, I think, the better. It is strictly a business discussion. I had not intended to submit any remarks to the committee upon this bill, but the debate has taken such a wide range, that I think it essential, in reference to the objects we have in view, that the attention of members should be recalled to the proposition which we have under consideration.

The simple question is this: whether a police shall be instituted for the city of Washington? In order to arrive at a correct conclusion upon this inquiry, the first question which presents itself, and which must be primarily decided by us is, whether there is any necessity for a police. Now, the office of a police is concededly that of the conservation of life and of property, and thus we at once approach this inquiry, whether property here is unsafe, or life is imperiled. The property around us is in danger at all times from plunderers and marauders. There is not, and never can be anywhere in society, safety for real property, or for chattels, so long as there are riches to be acquired, and poverty to be suffered. It is, therefore, sir, a subject not admitting of argument, that property is in need of conservation. Until you shall have removed Washington to the wilderness, or until you shall have established this Government elsewhere than here, and beyond the pale of civilized society, the property, whether of the United States or the property of individuals, whether personal or real, must, and should be, conserved. That is the answer to the first inquiry. It is not for me, nor for any other man, at this hour, or at this period of the session, to stand hesitating upon a question whether life is imperiled. Sir, can it be denied that on yonder avenue men, in the broad light of day, have been struck down by murderous arms? Can it be denied that force and violence have been applied here within these walls, and elsewhere without, to the peaceful citizen, clothed in the full panoply of law, and acting whether as lawmaker or law administrator? Can there be a question that morals are at present at serious discount? Can it be denied that as often as night descends, riot and contention arise? Who is there that taking his solitary walk by day through these streets does not depend upon his way-side companion, or his secret weapon, for protection? Who is there that can deny that wherever he takes his way under darkness, it is with trepidation lest before his return the murderer and assassin's arm shall be raised against him?

But, sir, it is not for us to stand discussing now whether a police is necessary for the city of Washington. Why, the very fact that a police has before this been formed, and that a police has had an anterior existence, is evidence to us all that a police is required; and that there have been these dangers, these violations of rights, this peril of limb and of life—all, all, is evidence that that police is defective and inefficient; and it devolves upon somebody somewhere to supply its weakness and to relieve its defects. And who is to grant this supply, or to administer to this relief, if it be not those who are the law-makers, not only of the people of the Union, but the especial law-makers for the people of this District? Why, sir, is it not folly to say, that because gentlemen called here from abroad produce these disturbances, therefore the law-makers should not act? Is it not folly to proclaim that because, forsooth, patronage may be created by the institution of a police force, therefore life and property should continue to be unsafe? There is no answer in that statement to the necessity to which I have alluded; it furnishes no argument why those who wield the assassin's dagger should not be restrained.

Sir, I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] when he appealed rather to moral forces for protection than to physical efforts. Sir, it is violence that we encounter; and violence accompanied by, and arising from, depravity of heart, can only be restrained by violence. They are kindred motive powers. He who would deal with a madman must restrain him by confinement; he who would restrain the arm of the assassin must restrain it by physical force. What lesson that you could teach would restrain the dagger dripping with blood, or would compel the murderer from his mad career? What answer could you give to those who are suffering beyond these walls in ever-recurring peril, if you should vainly endeavor to annul the highwayman's "stand and deliver" by moral rather than by physical force? It seems to me that my friend must be mistaken; and that the question which is now presented can be decided only as it has always been decided, whether in barbarous or civilized countries, by the resistance of force by force; by the restraint of the powerful over those who are less powerful but more depraved; by a resort to that self-protecting element of society, against the seeds of dissolution and decay with which it is deeply implanted.

Mr. QUITMAN. I think the honorable gentleman alludes to a part of my remarks.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do.

Mr. QUITMAN. I think he has misunderstood me. I did not intend, in speaking of moral influences, to say that I would dissuade the malefactor from the commission of crime. I intended simply to say that this mere additional military force or forces of any kind would not necessarily correct the evil; that it must be corrected by other means than a mere addition of brute force. Is there any reason to hope that a mere addition of physical force to the police would make that police more effective? There has not, I believe, occurred a single instance of violence in which a resort to physical force has been necessary to prevent it. The assassin strikes down in the dark, and from a covert. Half a dozen, or three men present would protect a man against them. It is not the want of physical protection, for the presence of one man would afford protection. It is to get men, as officers, who have intelligence, activity, and courage to investigate offenses, and bring criminals to justice. In London and Paris, and in the gentleman's own city, a crime can hardly be committed without the police being able to trace it up, and bring the offender to justice. There is no combination of men necessary to arrest an offender. My whole argument, I submit, was intended to show that we ought to direct our minds and intellects to the correction of the evil, not merely by an addition to the police force.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I agree in the main with my friend from Mississippi, in the position he has taken, and I assent to the proposition which he has made, that it would be better to prevent crime than, when committed, to cast about for the method of suppressing it. That certainly is a proposition which admits of no doubt, and I am not here for the purpose of arguing against it. If the mind and the morals of a community were in a normal state, there would be no necessity for physical restraint, there would be no necessity for correction; for the mind and the morals of the community would in such case have proceeded in that direction, where relief from the necessity of a supervising police would necessarily ensue. But where the public mind is not in that healthy condition, where morals are defective and depraved, and wherever a community exists under the sanctions and influences which usually prevail in the organization of modern society, we know full well that crime is engendered. Where evils of this sort have an existence, it is plain that a force must be created competent to separate the criminal from the offense. It is simply, as I said before, the opposition of one force to another force. I would prefer, everybody would prefer, that preventives should be employed that would relieve us of the necessity of the correction of crime. This I believe to be a fair statement of the difference between the gentleman and myself.

Sir, there are two considerations which present themselves in respect to this bill. I should say here that, as the bill and amendments stand, I cannot vote for them. They have serious and important defects. I do not think that they are incurable, but, on the contrary, believe that they may be remedied by two or three amendments. And it is because I think that their defects can be remedied, and a bill be formed which will receive the vote of the House, that I have risen to my feet on this occasion, for the purpose of presenting a few practical remarks.

In the first place, I think, in order to make a police force efficient, the appointing power should be deprived of all patronage. Not, sir, that I am so foolish as to suppose that patronage is not a necessary incident to appointment; but the power of appointment, instead of being concentrated, should be as divergent as possible, divided among many; and the many should result in turn from as many separate and diverging sources again.

Not that I would have them referable to the action of the elective franchise, for in that case you would create a force constituted by those very persons whom they are raised to restrain. For instance: an election is to occur here to-morrow for a board of police commissioners. Who are they that are to be marshaled to the polls? You all answer that they are respectable citizens, and they will be divided by party demarkation into Democrats and Republicans—perhaps equally divided. Who, then, are they who will hold the balance of power? Why, sir, the very individuals whom it is intended this police force shall restrain. Perhaps associations similar to the Plug Uglys, Rip Raps, or Dead Rabbits, will be there to control the polls either by securely possessing themselves of them, or by excluding those from them who would have a more legitimate presence there. Can gentlemen claim that those returned by the ballots of such men are those who ought to be put in power as a police? By no means.

But I am answered on the other side, if you do not elect your police commissioners, but refer them to the appointing power of the President, that these who are appointed will necessarily be party men; and if party men, by an equal necessity your police will be political partisans. Has it never occurred to gentlemen that if they are party men who are appointed by individuals to office, how much more must they be party men who are the elected candidates of a party? In the one case the party connection is remote; in the other it is direct. Who has ever heard of a candidate of the Republican or Democratic party, when elected for a specific purpose, abandoning that purpose and betraying his party? And if a candidate for the office of police commissioner be elected either as a Republican or as a Democrat, is it for one instant to be supposed that he will not act in favor of the party which elects him, strictly as a party man? and that he will not compose a police force of entirely political partisans? Sir, it is thus that you will encounter the very objection it is sought to avoid. You will thus have your police force a force of political partisans, and consequently useless to the community because destitute of its confidence.

As I said a few moments ago, I think it would be injudicious to leave the appointment to one man, although I am very free to say, and I think the judgment of gentlemen will concur with mine in this respect, that in large cities the power of the people becomes less potent for self protection, and the power of the one man more essentially required. This, I say, not that we should degenerate into despotism or tyranny, not that we should invoke the powers of a dictator for the conservation of the State or the body-politic, but it is clear that in all places where crime congregates, where property is accumulated, which provokes with temptation the bad impulses and the evil passions of our nature, those passions and impulses, with all their deleterious train, should be restrained by actual force; and that force which is fraught with the greatest power and concentrated with the most vigor, is the force most effectually restraining the infamous and the abandoned. But one gentleman has proclaimed that popular sovereignty is thus violated. I point him to his theory, and ask whether the truth which is applicable to Kansas has any appreciable presence here? The one is for the conservation of the realty, and of the personality not only, but of the lives of our fellow-citizens. The other is the great engine by which the polity of a people is established in their government by themselves.

Now, sir, in regard to this bill I have but a few words more to say, and for the simple reason that there is not much argument to be made upon it. It is a question of sheer, simple, practical import—such a question as every man, woman, and child, who has felt the impression of violence, can judge of unassisted. In the first place, this bill proposes (and I identify the original bill of the Senate with the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Virginia) that the chief shall be appointed by the President of the United States. I see no possible objection to this provision. The President of the United States, the Chief Magistrate of the nation! If there be any sanction in place—if there be any pride of position—any respectability attached to official station, they all attach there. Gentlemen say that the appointments may be of a partisan character. And so will every appointment be partisan that can be made, now or hereafter; and so have been all appointments, from the time of Adam to the present—whether you refer the partisanship to politics, to personal favoritism, or to any other source. You cannot strip the human mind of its bias. If it is to decide, it must decide upon reason; and all our reason, Mr. Chairman, is more or less influenced by our affections, our prejudices, or our passions. Were it otherwise, we should all agree. It is because we are human and infirm, and subject to the sway of conflicting emotions, that we differ where reason otherwise would make us of one accord. And so I cannot conceive that there is any good reason why the appointment of the chief of police should not be submitted to the hands of the chief officer of the Republic.

But, the chief having been selected, I demur entirely to the appointment by that chief of the officers and men who are to constitute that police force. Why, if you appoint a chief, whose duty it shall be to organize or make effective the men, and if you give to him the power of appointment or dismissal at his own will, without let or hindrance, except the sanction of the Secretary of the Interior, your police, before organization, will be degenerate. None will apply for enrollment but those who, in vulgar but expressive phrase, have axes to grind; and none will be appointed save those who will fully constitute a body-guard for the chief, and not a police for the city. The principle is altogether wrong. It has been found to work badly in practice. It has never been so in the city of New York, where thousands of policemen throng the streets and thread the ways, and guard the lives and property of her citizens. There the chief of police is but the chief servant of the public; he is the visible head, the organizer, the manipulator; but the superior power is vested in a board of police commissioners. And so should it be here. A board of police commissioners should be constituted of individuals different from any of those contemplated in the first section of the bill.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that he identifies, in this matter of appointment, the two bills—that passed by the Senate, and that which I had the honor to present as a substitute. The Senate bill gives the appointment of the captains and lieutenants to the chief, with the concurrence of the Senate. The bill which I have submitted deprives the chief of all power over the appointment of the captains and lieutenants, but gives him the appointment of the men. The Secretary of the Interior alone is authorized under the statute to appoint the captains and lieutenants, and the chief alone has the appointment of the men.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I understand the position of the gentleman from Virginia, and also the various provisions of the different bills before us; but in order to be sure, and in order that my remarks may not be subject to any mistake, I will read that part of the bill which I deem objectionable:

"The chief of the auxiliary guard shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the captains, lieutenants, and men shall be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary."

Mr. GOODE. That is the bill of the Senate.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have already enlarged on the reasons why this power of appointment should be taken from an individual, and especially from the chief; and the same reasons are applicable to the appointment and dismissal of the men. In reference more particularly to the last consideration, I will state, briefly, my points of objection. The person selected should be, with proper behavior on his part, secure of his position for life. If he is not, the sanctions with which he is clothed are improper and unworthy; and the moment they assume that character the confidence of the public will be justly withheld from him. He no longer then is a worthy member of the body, which, to be efficient, must possess the confidence of the public. Nor should he be dismissed at the chief's pleasure. By such a law you would make the chief an autocrat of the police; and by virtue of that one provision the city of Washington would, at any and every moment, be at the mercy of a chief of police, and not under the protection of the police itself; and, my word for it, that in six months from the day when such a law would take effect, the police would be as much worse than those whom it is intended to restrain, as they are worse than the respectable gentlemen who are seated here in their chairs.

Another objection to the act occurs in the same section of the bill. It is this: that this police force shall serve during the night, and in the day time when specially ordered to do so. The thought that a chief appointed by the President of the United States, and having, at his call and command men to go and come, and clothed with all the power of an autocrat, is to have it also within his power to say when and where these policemen shall serve, is an unreasonable thought, and should be rejected.

Mr. HUGHES. Upon that point, I would suggest to the gentleman that this chief of police will be employed as a Federal officer; and, according to usage and established custom, the President, by implication, will have the power of removing him.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The bill proceeds:—"to serve during the night, and in the daytime when specially ordered to do so."

Now, sir, in my opinion this is entirely too great a latitude to confer upon any individual, and especially upon a chief who is to receive his appointment in the manner designated. These policemen should be obliged to attend at all times. They are created for that purpose, and they should serve, not only during the night and in the day, but during every day, and every night, during all hours. Why, sir, if their service during the day or night is to depend upon the special direction of the chief, I do not know but that peaceful citizens who go to bed at night, before morning may, in the words of honest Dogberry, "be condemned to everlasting redemption."

There is another section to which I will refer briefly, and having spoken to that I shall have concluded all the remarks I deem it important to make upon this question. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] introduced a last section in which he proposes to clothe the chief with judicial powers. Now, sir, when this chief is selected, he should be selected with reference to his energy of character, his administrative powers, his ability to control men, and his general activity. Those are qualities rarely consulted in the selection of an officer to preside on the bench. You look here for reflection, knowledge, judgment, and a familiarity with criminal law. None of these are essential to a chief of police. And none of the qualities necessary for a chief of police are essential to the successful discharge of the judicial functions. I should say, therefore, that it would be exceedingly unwise to constitute such a court in such a manner. It may be necessary that such a court should be established; but to make a chief of police its judge would be, in my judgment, simply preposterous.

Therefore is it, and for these reasons, that I have determined unfavorably, so far as my vote is concerned, to the bill as it is presented; but my vote shall be given for the great principle of the bill, if the bill shall be made to conform to my views of propriety.

I will, in order to make it thus conform, offer, at the proper time, certain amendments. These amendments I propose to read as a part of my speech; and that gentlemen may be timely advised of their import, I propose to strike from the first section the words "when specially ordered to do so," and also the words "and the captains, lieutenants, and men, shall be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the captains, lieutenants, and men shall be appointed by a board of commissioners, hereby created and established for the purposes herein named, to consist of the Mayor of the city of Washington, the district attorney of the District of Columbia, and the marshal of the said District, and may be dismissed by said commissioners, but only for cause shown, on due notice, to the delinquent; and after trial before them, such proceedings and dismissal to be subject nevertheless to the review and approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

When you shall have adopted an amendment of that description, and have made the third section conform to this language—

That the board of commissioners hereinbefore named are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior—and when you shall have divorced the chief of police from the judicial tribunal contemplated by the bill, I think you will have placed the bill in a shape that will meet the approbation of a majority of the House.

Mr. GILMAN. I have but a few words to say in regard to the subject before the House.

Mr. KELLY. Will the gentleman give way to a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. GILMAN. I will detain the committee but a few moments. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with very great interest to this discussion, and notwithstanding the sagacious remarks that have been made in the committee in relation to this bill; notwithstanding we have had arguments upon the one side and upon the other, still it does seem to me that whatever bill this committee may suggest to the House, and whatever bill the House itself may sanction, in conjunction with the Senate, there is one point which we cannot overlook, and that is, that the condition of society in Washington is but a reflection of the Administration itself. That, sir, is my position, and it is fundamental. Now, the gentleman from New York has spoken here with the sincerity of an honest man. I agree with him heartily and sincerely in the general tone of his remarks. I believe we do demand here in Washington an efficient government; a government that will protect not only property but human life. No man more deeply or more sincerely regrets than I do the condition of things that prevails in this city at the present time.

But, sir, I have several questions to put to the gentleman from New York. I want to know how the Administration can sustain fraud in Kansas and a well-regulated government in Washington? And I have another question to put to the gentleman. How can the President, who has exhausted all his energy, and all the energy of his friends, who has employed all his associates and cohorts to impose upon this House and the country a gigantic fraud unparalleled in the history of civilized or uncivilized nations, be a suitable person to promote the administration of justice in the capital of the United States? Now, sir, I do not speak in a partisan sense. I stand not here in relation to this bill either as a Democrat, a Republican, or as an American.

But, sir, as sure as there is a sun in heaven, as sure as there is a proposition self-evident in mathematics or in morals, you cannot have a peaceable condition of things here in the city of Washington, if he who stands at the head of public affairs will sanction and approve a measure which every gentleman upon the floor of this House knows to be a fraud. There, sir, is my opinion of the President of the United States; and I regret, as the Representative of an honorable and intelligent constituency, that I am compelled to make this announcement. I repeat that you cannot have here, in this city, whatever bill you may pass, a good municipal government, unless you have a pure administration of public affairs.

Now, sir, I ask any gentleman upon this floor to look at the appointments which have been made in the Territory of Kansas. The men who are most deeply engaged in the violent and outrageous proceedings there, have been appointed to the highest positions in the Territory, by the President of the United States. And, sir, I desire to know, as a Representative upon this floor, what assurance and what guarantee have we that we shall not have men of similar character elevated to positions of trust and responsibility in the city of Washington? I declare to you, in all honesty and sincerity, that I have no confidence in the President of the United States. That is my opinion, frankly and plainly avowed.

Now, sir, I desire to know how it is that a party calling itself Democratic, can sanction a measure like that which has come from the Senate? But we are at once met with the suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that the existing condition of things overrides all general principles, that the sixty thousand people here in the city of Washington are not competent to administer their own affairs, but need the strong arm of the President of the United States to protect them. Is that Democracy? If the sixty thousand people, with all the advantages and privileges that the Government affords, and with all the associations that surround the Government, are not able to protect themselves, where will you find a people that are able to protect themselves?

But this bill proposes to place $10,000 in the hands of the President of the United States. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] will tell you that that is the secret service fund, and that in the administration of the affairs of a city such a fund is essential. Well, if it is essential, in the name of all that is just and honorable and fair, do not put the money in the hands of the highest Executive of the nation. I would rather that my own life, and the life of my associates, should continue to be exposed to danger, than that the President of the United States should hold that money in his hands. If dirty work must be done, let it be done by other hands.

But, sir, I am not going to overlook a general principle, I care not how great the emergency may be. If the population of this city, with all its intelligence, its wealth, and its resources, cannot administer its own affairs, there is something wrong, and let us wait until we have another administration of public affairs; let us place at the head of the Government, not a man who does not embody a spurious Democracy, but a man who embodies the high and noble principles of Washington and Jefferson, and then let us see if we cannot have a different condition of affairs here.

But there is another consideration in relation to this subject, and that is the unlimited exercise of executive power. Look at the condition of things in the country at the present moment. Your Treasury is exhausted; and it has been exhausted by no act of Congress, but by the dictum of the President of the United States. Under a construction of the act of 1820, the President has exhausted, and is exhausting, the Treasury of the United States, without coming to the Commons, to the Representatives of the people, for authority. I listened with pleasure to the remarks made upon that subject by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] and other gentlemen upon that side of the House. And, however small a thing it may be to curtail the executive power in the District of Columbia, I would rather suffer personally than tolerate its exercise.

I believe that the amendment which has been offered to the bill by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DONN,] embodies all that is necessary for the protection of life and property. I say to gentlemen on both sides of the House, let us test the ability of the people to administer their own affairs with a reasonable and fair measure; and, if they prove themselves entirely incompetent to protect life and property, then, perhaps, we may resort to despotism; but let us try everything before we resort to what I deem tantamount to the exercise of despotic power.

The President of the United States may have suggested this very scheme. For aught I know, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] indicates the opinions of the Executive.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to disclaim all such authority.

Mr. GILMAN. I accept the gentleman's disclaimer, but precedents are dangerous things sometimes; and, sir, it is astonishing with what facility, with what address, with what adroitness, the President can change his tactics from Kansas to the District of Columbia; and, sir, this Democracy, so pure, so unadulterated, and which pretends to represent the will of the people, I am sorry to say, is a Democracy which partakes more of despotism and tyranny than of republicanism and liberty. I am not surprised, sir, after the four years' administration of President Pierce, which was a blot upon the annals of the country, and after the experience we have realized of the present Administration—I am not surprised that a bill containing such provisions should be presented to an American Congress. The same mind that conceived and recommended to us a Leecompton swindle, can with facility sanction this bill, which violates the principles upon which the Government is founded.

By natural reasoning—by a logical inference—we have this bill. Now, what does the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] and the other gentlemen who defend this bill say? They say, "are you going to leave property and life exposed in this city?" No, sir, I say; let us, as honorable men, without regard to partisan feelings or partisan emotions, present to the House a bill which will enable the citizens to dispose and direct their own affairs. Let us also recommend to the House a liberal appropriation to sustain the municipal government. If experience demonstrates that the people are really incompetent to govern themselves by their own officers, then we will resort to more extreme measures.

The gentleman from New York pays a tribute to the President of the United States, and is willing, from personal considerations, to give him this power. Ah! I wish I could agree with the gentleman from New York; but I must say, in all sincerity, that I cannot repose that confidence in the President.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take up this bill in detail. I have simply indicated my views at large in reference to it; but I do sincerely hope that this House—both parties and all parties uniting and cooperating—will not leave this city without establishing a municipal organization that will protect human life and property.

I will say, in conclusion, there is enough to engage the attention, and absorb the time of the President of the United States in the administration of the affairs of twenty-five million people; enough to perplex and annoy him without imposing upon him the task of preserving order in this city. He is the President of the Republic, and not the policeman of Washington.

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. BILLINGHURST, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being Senate bill "To establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington," and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject; and had come to no resolution thereon.

An then, on motion of Mr. BOWIE, (at twenty-five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

NEXT MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution for consideration; which lies over under the rule:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on the first Monday of June next, it shall be to meet again on the first Monday in November following.

SUPPLIES OF THE UTAH ARMY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I offer the following resolution of inquiry, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of a contract made with Russell, Majors, and Waddell, for furnishing beef cattle, (oxen for the trains,) entered into in March, 1853. Also, to state what contracts, if any, have been made by the Department of War, or under its authority, during the present session of Congress, in connection with the Utah expedition, without public notice.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. STUART. I would suggest to the Senator from Maine to amend his resolution so as to include orders that have been given for the purchase of materials, horses, or cattle, without purchase at public sale.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a document communicated which states all the purchases made up to the period when the contract alluded to in the resolution was made.

Mr. STUART. But I allude to orders issued since.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will put his amendment in writing, I have no objection to it.

Mr. STUART. It is to add to the resolution:

And also what orders or instructions have been given to the Quartermaster General, or through him, for the purchase of horses, cattle, grain, or other supplies, up to this date, specifying particularly the terms of such orders or instructions.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 263) granting the right of way over the depot grounds, on the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Copeland, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 264) confirming to Alexander Copeland title to four hundred and eighty acres of land in Sonoma county, California. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, reported a bill (S. No. 264) to prevent desertion, and to facilitate the enlistment of soldiers in the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of the merchants of New Orleans, praying that a steam revenue cutter may be built to be stationed in the Gulf of Mexico, has directed me to report adversely to the prayer of the petition. In making this report, I wish to say that I acceded to it reluctantly on the grounds stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. The financial difficulties in which the Treasury is now involved, afford, in my judgment, a sufficient reason for deferring a recommendation for this change in relation to revenue cutters until we have more means for carrying out the system. The committee ask to be discharged, therefore, from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES LAWRENCE.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence, have directed me to report it back, and recommend its passage. I call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to this bill. It is the case of which he spoke to me yesterday.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope the Senate will consent to pass that bill now. The object is merely to give the party who memorializes Congress the right to locate certain land. He has already made a location which has been set aside by the Land Office, and the law authorizing the location has expired. This is to give him the right to make a further location, in place of the one set aside.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill. It authorizes the assignees or legal representatives of James Lawrence, (to whom was issued donation certificate number three hundred and sixty, under the eighth section of the act of 24th of May, 1828, entitled "An act to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami canal from Dayton to Lake Erie, and to grant a quantity of land to that State to aid in the construction of the canals authorized by law, and for making donations of land to certain persons in Arkansas Territory,") to relocate the certificate upon any of the public lands in the State of Arkansas, subject to entry at a minimum of not more than $1.25 per acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading; read the third time, and passed.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, which has been ordered to its third reading. I do not think it can take long.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 6) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, was read a third time and passed.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to call up the bill, (S. No. 152,) being a bill to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society. I will state, in a word, that it came up in its order the other day, but there were some amendments which had not been quite prepared in committee. They are now ready, and I suppose it will take only three or four minutes to dispose of the bill. It is very desirable that it should pass now, so that it may get through Congress at this session, to the end that the corporations may go on during the summer and prosecute the work. If it is delayed they cannot do it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill.

For the purpose of completing the erection, now in progress, of "a great national monument to the memory of Washington, at the seat of the Federal Government," Winfield Scott, Walter Jones, John J. Abert, James Kearney, Thomas Carberry, Peter Force, William A. Bradley, Philip R. Fendall, Walter Lenox, Matthew F. Maury, and Thomas Blagden, (being the survivors of the persons mentioned in a certain grant, bearing date on the 12th of April, 1848, by James K. Polk, then President of the United States, in virtue of a joint resolution of Congress, approved on the 31st of January, in the same year, of an authority to erect a monument to the memory of George Washington, on reservation numbered three, in the city of Washington,) and also Archibald Henderson, Jonathan B. H. Smith, William W. Seaton, Eli-sha Whittlesey, Benjamin Ogle Tayloe, and John Carroll Brent, and their successors, to be elected in the manner directed in the bill, are to be a corporation and body-politic, by the name and style of "The Washington National Monument Society." The easement, and all the rights and privileges conveyed in the grant, are to be vested in, and confirmed to, this corporation; and any and all property, and right of property, of any and every kind and description, whether in possession, or in action, or in expectancy, or in possibility, which may at any time before the passing of this act have been acquired by the voluntary association heretofore known by the name of the Washington National Monument Society, or which may hereafter be acquired by this corporation, are to be vested in, and confirmed to, the corporation. It is to be competent for the persons named and described in the bill as constituting the corporation, and their successors, to remove, by a vote of four fifths of them, any of their number; but for any other purpose a quorum of five shall be sufficient for the transaction of business. When any vacancy shall happen in the corporation, from death or resignation, or otherwise, the remaining members are to elect a successor to fill the same, within ten days after the happening of such vacancy; and on failure to fill it within thirty days, the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia is to proceed against the corporation by a writ of scire facias, for a forfeiture of the charter.

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed by the committee to move to amend the bill, in section three, by striking out "for any other purpose a quorum of five shall be sufficient for the transaction of business," and inserting:

For any other act within the legitimate objects of this corporation a quorum of five shall be sufficient for the transaction of business: Provided, That notice of all meetings which may not be provided for in the by-laws and ordinances of the corporation, shall be given to all members thereof residing within the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I now propose this amendment: in section four, at the end of line ten, after the clause directing the district attorney to proceed against the corporation for a forfeiture of the charter, in a certain contingency, to insert:

Before the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and the adjudication of that court thereon shall be conclusive; and, should this charter be so adjudged forfeited, the monument, and other improvements and property held under the same, shall be placed by the President of the United States under the care and custody of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, or such other officer of the United States as he shall designate for the time being.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I move, in section five, line fifteen, to strike out the words, "or a majority of them;" so as to read, "elect, so soon after the passage of this act as may be convenient, such officers as they may deem proper."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I move another amendment; in section five, line seventeen, after the word "regulations," to insert "consonant to the objects of this charter;" so that it will read, "and to make and ordain such constitution, by-laws, ordinances, and regulations consonant to the objects of this charter as they may deem expedient and proper."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I have one other amendment; in section five, line twenty-one, to strike out all after the word "President," and insert, "and that the Governors for the time being of the several States of the United States shall be respectively ex-officio vice presidents of the said society, corporation, and body-politic; and that all meetings thereof shall be held, and all records and papers thereof kept at the said city of Washington;" so that it will read:

Provided, always, That the President of the United States for the time being, shall be ex-officio president, and that the Governors for the time being of the several States of the United States, shall be respectively ex-officio vice presidents of the said society, corporation, and body-politic; and that all meetings thereof, shall be held, and all records and papers thereof kept at the said city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment in section two, line seven, to strike out the words "or in possibility." This is an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to it. I do not think the words mean anything in the connection in which they are, and it is well enough to strike them out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those words are in brackets in the printed bill, and were considered, as reported by the committee, to be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time and passed.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the addition of one member to the Committee on Private Land Claims for the remainder of the session, and to dispense with the rules for that purpose. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who objected to it the other day, has been kind enough to withdraw his objection.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore was authorized to make the appointment.

ISSUING OF LAND PATENTS.

Mr. STUART. I would be glad if the Senate would indulge me by passing a bill which was passed at the last session, simply to authorize the issuing of patents to States to whom land grants have been made for railroad purposes. The law is a title undoubtedly, but it is found necessary to have a patent that can be recorded, in order to satisfy purchasers that there is an actual title to the land. The bill does not contain more than eight or nine lines.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 204) to provide for issuing patents in certain cases where grants of the public lands have been made by Congress.

It provides that, in all cases where any grant of public lands has been made by Congress to any State, for the purpose of aiding the construction of any railroad, canal, or other similar improvement, the State, or its grantees, shall be entitled to receive a patent for all lands so granted, upon producing satisfactory proof to the Secretary of the Interior that the conditions of the grant have been complied with.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment in line six, to strike out the words "or its grantees," after the word "State."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire why this bill is not made prospective as well as retrospective. Why not say "in all cases where any grant of public lands has been or may hereafter be made?"

Mr. STUART. I have no objection to that. I would state to the Senator that this was a bill referred to the committee, and, being the same one that was passed at the last session, the committee reported it back with this single amendment. The Senator can offer the amendment he suggests. I see no objection to it.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "been," in the third line, the words "or shall hereafter be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING. The title ought to be amended. I see it alludes only to the past.

Mr. STUART. The words "to the States" should also be inserted.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill to provide for issuing patents in certain cases where grants of public lands have been or shall be made to the States by Congress."

TELEGRAPH TO UTAH.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. On the question taken yesterday or the day before, to postpone to the 1st of December next, the bill to facilitate communication with the army in Utah, I voted in the affirmative. I did not understand the question at the time. I supposed it was merely to lay the bill on the table. I move that the vote then taken be reconsidered; and in making this motion I do not desire to be understood as committing myself in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the consideration of the motion at this time?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir, intending then to lay the subject on the table for the present.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope the bill will not be reconsidered now. The Senate is very thin. Many of the gentlemen who voted against the bill are absent. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will agree to postpone his motion.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will not insist on it if the gentleman persists in his opposition, but I have no intention of calling it up for action now. It is hoped that the bill may be amended and put in an unobjectionable form.

Mr. SLIDELL. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to say that he wished immediate action on the question of reconsideration.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish merely that it may be reconsidered and the subject laid on the table.

Mr. SLIDELL. I prefer that notice should be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky can enter his motion, and its consideration can be determined hereafter.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I gave notice that I should to-day call up the bill regulating the public printing. The Committee on Printing are not prepared to do so to-day, and I give notice now, that on Thursday next it will be called up for consideration.

PROTECTORATE OVER MEXICO.

Mr. HOUSTON. I beg to remark that on next Monday I shall request the Senate, in the morning hour, to take up my resolution on the subject of the protectorate of Mexico, to enable me to render some reasons for it. I hope I shall be indulged by the Senate.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. STUART. If the morning business is through, as it is within seven minutes of the time for the consideration of the special order, I move that we now proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, and all other Government service, by railroad, from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. POLK to strike out, in section one, lines seven and eight, the words "between the mouths of the Big Sioux and Kansas rivers," and insert:—"or in the western boundary line of the State of Missouri, or of the State of Arkansas, between the Big Sioux river and Fort Smith, on the Arkansas river."

Mr. POLK. Mr. President, in my opinion, we ought not to undertake to build more than one road to the Pacific ocean. In the first place, I do not think we are equal to the task of building more than one road. No one appreciates more highly than I do, the vast resources, the great national power, the energy, and the enterprise and indomitable perseverance of our people. In all these respects, no nation, that "has ever flourished in the tide of time," has excelled us. I believe that on the face of the earth there is not, and there never has been, a people superior to us in all these respects.

But, sir, the enterprise of building a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific is one of stupendous proportions. Its proportions are stupendous in reference to its length; in reference to the difficulties of the route that must be surpassed and overcome; and from the further fact, that it traverses for almost its entire distance a vast region of country uninhabited. Two thousand miles of distance will scarcely cover the length that must be traversed by such a road. Hills must be cut down; valleys must be elevated; mountains must be ascended; and broad rivers and streams must be bridged. It will be the first time in the history of the world, as I believe, in which such an enterprise has been attempted; that is, an enterprise to run such a line of communication through a region of country so vast as this, and yet almost entirely without population. It will require millions of treasure to build it. It will require the labors of thousands of men, I fear, for many years. It is an enterprise whose gigantic dimensions will task this young Hercules among the nations of the earth to the full extent of his abilities. The Hercules, however, I hope and believe, is equal to the task; but I believe that he is nothing more than equal to it.

In the next place, sir, if we could build more than one road, I think we ought not to do it, as a Government, for I think it is perfectly certain, that even if one road should be built, it would scarcely be a paying investment; that is, for the money that would be expended, the Government would scarcely realize, in the way of interest, a suitable return; for, sir, we know that the best railroads of the country, passing over the most densely populated districts, connecting the largest cities, the most populous cities, the cities most important in commerce and manufactures, do not pay adequately for their cost. The great national importance of the proposed road as a medium of communication between the Atlantic States and the Pacific ocean, I consider to be vast enough, however, in every respect in which it can be viewed, to justify us in sinking, if you please, the amount of money that will be necessary to construct one track; but I think it will hardly justify the building of more than one—especially when we consider the fact that all the great national ends of intercommunication between the two seaboard, intercommunication that shall span the continent, are reached by one road.

Then, sir, I maintain next, that if we build only one road, that road ought to be a central one—central in respect to the States, central in respect to the population of the country, and central in respect to the trade and travel and commerce to be accommodated. It seems to me that the mere statement of that proposition, to any unbiased mind, is enough to amount to a demonstration in its favor. If central, it will, and no other one can, produce the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of the people of the country.

I think that a road from the Pacific which shall meet the valley of the Mississippi between the two points limited in the bill, namely, the mouth of the Big Sioux river on the north, and the mouth of the Kansas river on the south, cannot be central in the respects of which I have just now spoken. The parallel of latitude passing through the mouth of the Big Sioux, will leave entirely south of the line the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida—twenty-two in all—having an aggregate area, in square miles, of 1,040,926, and a population, according to the census of 1850, of 16,752,662; while there will be, entirely north of the line, only the States of Minnesota, Vermont, Maine, and New Hampshire—four in number—having an area in square miles of 217,283, and a population in 1850, of 1,401,729. This line will intersect the States of Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, New York, and Massachusetts, having an area in square miles of 215,881, and a population of 4,987,167. If that parallel of latitude is traced eastwardly until it strikes the Atlantic, it will pass through a part of Canada, and a road on that line will be as near to Montreal and Quebec, as it will be to even Boston or New York. It would be, therefore, as central to Montreal and Quebec, and all the Canadas, as it would be to the cities I have named, and much more central than it would be to Philadelphia and Baltimore, and the other more southern cities on the Atlantic sea-board.

If we take a parallel of latitude passing through the mouth of the Kansas river, it would intersect the States of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and New Jersey, having an area of 279,474 square miles; and a population, according to the census of 1850, of 7,088,041. It would leave entirely north of it, the States of Massachusetts, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Maine, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont, with an area of 485,144 square miles, and a population, in 1850, of 9,219,019. It would leave entirely south of it, the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, with an area of 709,472 square miles—about equal to the area of the States entirely north, as well as of the States intersected by it; and thus throwing most of the territory of the States south of that line, that is to say, such a line would be north of centrality, in the sense in which I have defined the word, which undoubtedly is its true sense as applicable to this subject.

Now, sir, San Francisco, if I rightly understand its geographical locality, is in latitude about $37^{\circ} 45'$ North. The mouth of the Kansas river is between 39° and 40° of north latitude, and the mouth of the Big Sioux about $42^{\circ} 40'$; so that in order to reach San Francisco from the mouth of the Kansas you would have to go South, if you were able to go in a right line between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific ocean, about two degrees of latitude, and from the mouth of the Big Sioux, if you were able to go in a right line, about five degrees of latitude. But, sir, we know the fact to be that there is no railroad line which can traverse the country between San Francisco and the other two points that are named, the mouths of Big Sioux and the Kansas rivers, and yet go in a right line; because the Sierra Nevada range of mountains have no passes directly east of San Francisco. They must be passed either far north of San Francisco, or a good many miles south of it. Therefore, as the most practicable pass, in my opinion, is south of San Francisco, in order to get from the mouth of the Kansas river even, (to say nothing of the Big Sioux,) you have not only to make a southing of two degrees in the first instance, and five degrees in the last, in order to come down to the latitude of San Francisco, but you would have to make a southing that would bring you down to about the thirty-fifth parallel, so that you would have a southing of seven degrees in the one case, and of twelve degrees in the other. The distance on the route surveyed on or near the thirty-fifth parallel by Lieutenant Whipple—the Whipple route I will call it—from Fort Smith to the crossing on the Colorado, is one thousand three hundred and ninety-five miles, and from the same point to the east bank of the Rio Grande is one thousand one hundred and thirty-five miles, making a distance of only two hundred and sixty miles between the Rio Grande and the Rio Colorado. If, therefore, you start at the mouth of the Kansas, you have, in order to get on the thirty-fifth parallel, to make a southing of three hundred and fifty miles, being ninety miles more than the entire distance between the Rio Grande and the Colorado, and from the mouth of the Big Sioux a southing of seven and a half degrees, equal to five hundred and twenty miles—just twice as great exactly as the difference between these two rivers on the Whipple route.

Then it is perfectly self-evident, it seems to me, that in order to run a route that shall be central to the States, central to the population, and central to the business, the trade, and commerce of the country, you must start at a point even south of the mouth of the Kansas river. It appears to be generally conceded that for the western terminus of the road, San Francisco is the proper point. Taking San Francisco as the point of termination on the Pacific coast, then, I think, as did the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] yesterday, that if we were at liberty to make such a selection as we would make if there were no extraneous or foreign controlling influences, we should take a point on the Mississippi, or in the valley of the Mississippi, that should be about on the same latitude as San Francisco; and this would require us to go still further south than the mouth of the Kansas. But, sir, as I have already hinted, I now affirm, that, in my judgment, the best route, (and that seems to be the opinion of most other Senators who have expressed themselves on this subject,) the most practicable and most easy route, the best in point of climate and agricultural resources, is the route over or near the thirty-fifth parallel. If that is the best route, we ought to take it; and if we ought to take it, it seems to me an act of folly, almost, to commence at a point three hundred and fifty miles at the shortest, if you take the mouth of the Kansas, and five hundred and twenty if you take the mouth of the Big Sioux, north of what is to be the line you must travel when you traverse the vast distance and almost entire distance between the two termini of the road.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that the route on the thirty-fifth parallel is the best route—first, because it is the most direct. The route on or near the thirty-fifth parallel never ascends north as far as the thirty-sixth parallel until you have crossed the Sierra Nevada range of mountains; and it never bends south as far as the thirty-fourth parallel. More than that, sir, it traverses the valley of the Canadian up to almost its source, a distance of about seven hundred and forty-five miles from Fort Smith. It then passes over the dividing ridge between the Canadian and the Pecos, at Anton-Chico, at a distance of about one hundred miles, and strikes the valley of the Rio Grande. It then goes on in almost a direct line to the Colorado, a distance of only two hundred and sixty miles, as I have already stated. It crosses the dividing ridges between the Canadian and the Pecos, and the latter river and the Canadian, and passes between the Rio Grande and the Rio Colorado over a country that is abundantly supplied with grasses, and with wood, and with water. The line is almost a straight parallel between Fort Smith and the crossing of the Colorado river.

In another respect this line has great advantages. In traversing the entire distance from Fort Smith up the Canadian it goes on the valley of a river. It therefore is very nearly a level. The worst of the route in respect to grades is betwixt the Pecos and the Rio Grande, and then betwixt the Rio Grande and Colorado; but in all that distance there is no grade as heavy as now exists on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and there is no tunneling to be done on any part of the line. On the entire line there is not a grade of more than one hundred feet, except for six miles. The average grade of the entire line is only thirty-three and one third feet to the mile, and for about one thousand miles of the course the grade is not more than twenty feet to the mile.

Mr. MASON. What line is that you are now speaking of?

Mr. POLK. This is the route that was surveyed by Lieutenant Whipple.

Judging from the letters which I have seen, published by Lieutenant Beale, who traversed the distance betwixt the Colorado and the Rio Grande on pretty nearly the thirty-fifth parallel, but not entirely on the same route surveyed by Lieutenant Whipple, I should suppose the grades are much lighter. We all recollect what was said in his first letter—that he passed over that road without being compelled to double the teams in his wagons more than once or twice; and he further stated, if I recollect rightly, that in making the ascent to and the descent down from the highest point in the route, it was approached with a degree of gentleness of slope that almost deprived it of the characteristics of a hill.

Besides, I think this route has great advantages in another important respect—in point of the salubrity of its climate. We have the testimony of Lieutenant Whipple on this subject. We know the further fact, that he passed over this route so as to be on the eastern portion during the hottest portion of the summer, and to be on the more westerly portion of it during the winter season; and he says, at the highest point of elevation, according to his measurement, which was seven thousand nine hundred and forty-six feet, about the 18th of November, the maximum at which his thermometer stood was fifty-two degrees, the minimum was twenty-nine and eight tenths degrees, and the mean was forty-six degrees. Between the 27th and 31st of December, he was at the next highest point of elevation, seven thousand four hundred and fifty feet, and then his highest temperature was seventy-one degrees, his lowest twenty-three and five tenths, and his mean forty-seven degrees. Now, if you take St. Louis, at an altitude of four hundred and fifty feet, between the 21st and 23d of December you have a maximum of fifty-seven degrees, a minimum of ten, and a mean of forty-six. If we take the same city on the 18th of November, the date I first mentioned, we have a maximum of seventy-two degrees, a minimum of twenty-seven degrees, and a mean of forty-six and ninety-five one hundredths. I am one of those who think there can be no more favorable latitude for the running of railroads, in respect to temperature, than the latitude of St. Louis.

But, sir, Lieutenant Beale, as I have said, has lately passed over this route, first in the summer time, in going to the Pacific, and next in the winter time, in returning; and he says, in his report to the War Department:

"As I informed you in my last dispatch, the object of this journey was to satisfy myself fully as to the practicability or impracticability of traveling the contemplated road in midwinter. With this view, I left the Tejon Pass, in the Sierra Nevada, on the 2d of January, and, traveling leisurely, arrived at Albuquerque on the 24th of February, having passed the heart of the winter on the more elevated portion of the road.

"From the Colorado river to Sabedras spring, we found no snow whatever. From the latter point to Sitgreaves mountain, we found it occasionally in patches where it was sheltered by banks and cedar trees from the sun. From Sitgreaves mountain to a small hill lying to the eastward of it, we found snow for the first time so deep as to cover the ground. This continued for a distance of three miles, and was a foot in depth, and sometimes more, on the level. It was the only occasion on which we found the surface of the earth covered.

"Crossing this, which is the highest point over which the road passes, to the Roux spring, we gradually descended to the Little Colorado, finding snow only in small patches, and that rapidly melting away. On the Little Colorado there was none. On February 12, snow fell, but melted almost as soon as it reached the earth; and, although it snowed all night, there was not a trace of it to be seen on the succeeding day. Timber was everywhere so abundant that our camp blazed every night with cheerful fires; and, although I brought tents for the use of the men, they were never used on a single occasion, the men preferring, as well as myself, to lie in the open air.

"The thermometer, of which observations were taken at sundown, at four o'clock in the morning, and at noon, will give you a better idea of the climate than any description; the coldest night we experienced being on the 5th of February, when the thermometer stood at 18° at four o'clock in the morning. Grass we found as abundant as on our previous journey, and neither men nor animals suffered in the least from cold during the journey homeward."

Next, as to wood, water, and grass: the longest distance without grass is not ten miles; the longest distance without wood is not nineteen miles; the longest distance without water is not fifteen miles.

Mr. MASON. What road is that, I would ask the honorable Senator?

Mr. POLK. The route near the thirty-fifth parallel still.

Mr. MASON. On what authority does the honorable Senator make these statements?

Mr. POLK. Lieutenant Whipple.

Mr. MASON. In the railroad report?

Mr. POLK. Yes, sir. Now submit that that is a showing which is more satisfactory, probably, than almost any one had anticipated who had heard the region betwixt the Rio Grande and the Colorado always spoken of as a desert country. We know that that route passes, as I have already said, for upwards of seven hundred miles up the valley of the Canadian; and Lieutenant Whipple tells us, in the report of his survey, that the valley of the Canadian is a more desirable valley than that of the Kansas river. It then goes over to the Pecos. It next, in an almost direct line, and that not a long one, strikes the Rio Grande at or about Albuquerque; and in the neighborhood of that point are the heaviest settlements in New Mexico. It then, going west, penetrates the center of the continent not only by the valleys of the rivers I have named, but it also strikes the Zuni valley, passes through the valley of the Colorado, Chiquito or Flax river, as Lieutenant Whipple calls it, of the San Francisco, and of the Colorado of the West and its tributaries; and thus it passes for a great portion of the way through the valleys of rivers and streams abounding with vegetation of all kinds, grasses, timber, and fuel; and when it is on the elevated region it passes over a country that is supplied with wood and with grass in abundance. It therefore has the most extensive (and more extensive probably than has been generally imagined) region of cultivable land between the two points to be reached, and sufficient to guaranty the confident expectation that if this line of communication shall be opened up, it will not only be an easy but a necessary consequence that there will be a line of settlements extending from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry of him for a moment?

Mr. POLK. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I have here a table which I took from the speech recently delivered by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. Gwin,] and which purports to exhibit the several routes explored for a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific—I presume taken from those railroad reports which have been printed. The routes are eight in number; and, in the appropriate column, there is shown the number of miles of route through land generally uncultivable, arable soil being found in small areas; and the shortest distance of the land thus waste and uncultivable that is given in the tables is eleven hundred and fifty-nine miles, and the longest distance is sixteen hundred and twenty miles. I have not examined—I have not had the means of examining—the six volumes of railroad reports; but I presume, coming from the Senator from California, that this table has been correctly taken; and of the eight routes here given, the shortest, as I have said, shows eleven hundred and fifty-nine miles of waste and desert land. I present this in contrast with the exposition now made by the Senator from Missouri, and which he says is taken from one of the reports of Lieutenant Whipple.

Mr. POLK. I will first allow the Senator from California to repeat what he did state when he made that quotation the other day.

Mr. GWIN. That table was taken from the seventh volume of the Surveys—the last one, which has not yet been printed and bound. It is the official report of engineers, condensed in that table. I stated at the time that I thought their calculations, in this respect, were entirely delusive. I am perfectly confident of that fact. This region that they have set down as not being fit for cultivation, I stated in the few remarks that I made, I believed to contain as fine land as there was on the continent, and I have not a solitary doubt that the engineers were entirely mistaken in their opinion on this point. It is an uninhabited country, and they have asserted a theory in regard to it that I do not think is to be relied upon. I think every fact the Senator from Missouri has stated will be found in the detailed reports and other information.

Mr. POLK. I had prepared, by a good deal of labor, a table—which I did not bring up here, and I am now sorry I did not—showing exactly the amount and length of the cultivable and uncultivable land, according to the opinion of these engineers. But the view I was presenting to the Senate was this: that there was a large proportion of cultivable land on the Whipple route so distributed that the spaces between the regions in which grass, timber, water, and fuel, including both wood and coal, were to be found, were so short that you could go from one to the other over the uncultivable regions without encountering long stretches of country, where you could not get the supplies necessary for a railroad. I believe, as was stated by the Senator from California, that the engineers underrate the fertility of this region. Why, sir, they put down the valley of the Rio Grande as being a barren country, although the analysis of the soil shows that the elements of fertility are there in a degree—I am now speaking from recollection—about equal to the valley of the Mississippi. The only reason that certain districts are put down as barren is, that at certain seasons of the year there is not a sufficient supply of water to maintain abundant vegetation upon them. But, to use the language of Mr. Secretary Davis, in one of his reports, just introduce water into them and the vegetation springs up with a richness and luxuriousness almost unequalled on the face of the globe; and that in regions of country where you can irrigate without much trouble.

The Senator from California stated—I have not myself gone into that calculation, but I have seen, in the reading I have made since the Senate adjourned yesterday, a statement that corroborated what he said—that the water in the Rio Colorado is higher than the surface of most of the valley through which it runs. I have seen, since the Senate adjourned, in one of those railroad reports, that, several miles back of the river, the surface of the ground was lower than the water in the river, at its medium stage. Irrigation, therefore, in such a case, is as easy as could be desired. On that point I have this to say: suppose there are stretches of country where you must traverse long distances without a very abundant supply of those things that make railroading easy and cheap—first, I believe that, on this route, these stretches are shorter than on any other; and next, this matter is important enough, in my opinion, to justify an effort to overcome slight—yes, sir, great —obstacles, in securing the connection of the Republic on its eastern side with its new portion on the western side of the Rocky Mountain range.

I have already referred to wood for fuel. There is also timber for its construction on many portions of the road. There is timber in the valleys, both of the Arkansas and the Canadian; there is timber on the Rio Grande; there is timber on the Mogollon mountains; there is timber on several of the mountain ranges between the Rio Grande and the Colorado. Timber will have to be carried, it is conceded, in many places, for some distance. Timber has to be carried in many places, where you make a railroad over a dead level, as in the State of Illinois. When you get into a prairie country, or upon the plains that lie at the base of the Rocky Mountains, especially on their east side, you must expect to transport timber for the construction of the road.

Lieutenant Whipple, observes in his report, that the route on the thirty-fifth parallel runs in a region of country where the supply of moisture, that is, the precipitation, as they call it, is greater than it is either directly north or directly south of the line, owing to the peculiar conformation of the country.

We have, then, in these important elements, a country able to supply timber and fuel; and in the Delaware mountains it is ascertained that there is coal; and it is supposed, though it is not stated with entire certainty, because the explorations have not been sufficiently carried out, that there is also coal in many other portions of the belt of country between the Rio Grande and the Rio Colorado. In these important particulars, therefore, the country is adapted to sustain a population; and the fact is, that in making your progress to the Pacific you pass through a population the densest, as I have already said, that there is in New Mexico. In the neighborhood of Albuquerque is a civilized and valuable population; and as you pass on, you traverse regions inhabited by the Pueblo Indians, as at Zuni. You have a population at these points, not because it has been carried there by the enterprise of Americans, but a population, the civilized portion of which has been planted there by Mexico and old Spain, and the semi-civilized portion of it by the missionary labors of the benevolent and Christian missionaries of those countries.

When we have these facts, it seems to me that we have as strong a guarantee as any reasonable, or even doubting man ought to ask, to be assured that, if this line of communication is opened up, you can calculate upon a sufficient strength and frequency of settlement along it, to supply it with all the necessities in order to enable it to work successfully and cheaply. That, I say, is itself no small consideration in favor of the route.

Now, sir, if the route on the thirty-fifth parallel is the proper one, the best one, the question is whether, in making a terminus for the eastern end of the route, we ought not to so provide in the bill that you may have a terminus which shall be as near as possible to this direct route, facile, and at the same time central, to the country; central to the country with reference to its territory; central with reference to its population, its business, and its trade and travel.

I know, Mr. President, that the enterprise of building this railroad is a gigantic and difficult one. I believe that it will tax the energies and the patience and the persevering efforts of this country to a very high degree; perhaps to the very last extreme. I believe that it rises in grandeur far above the pyramids, and transcends in magnitude the Chinese wall. I know it requires the most courageous faith, and even the most ardent hope, to contemplate it as feasible; but, sir, I am one of those who believe that the fullness of time for the completion of the work, or at least for the commencement of it, is upon us. The Democratic party, in its last national convention at Cincinnati, declared in favor of it. The expectation of the people in every part of the Union, North and South, East and West, and especially West—not the expectation merely but the longing and the anxious demands, and I think the just demands, that ought not to be unheeded another moment, of the people of the west side of the Rocky Mountains, require the commencement of this work. I think that the President, sagacious and experienced and patriotic as he is, when he spoke first favorably of this enterprise in his inaugural address, and then recommended it in his last annual message, no more than expressed the desires of the Democratic party and the general expectations of the entire country. I believe that if Congress do not make some provision for commencing this grand enterprise, necessary not merely to the development of the resources of the country and the safety of its people, but necessary almost, as I believe, to the integrity of the Union—if Congress do not take some immediate and earnest and determined steps towards accomplishing it, they will not meet the general expectations of the constituency that sent them here from every part of the country. I will not detain the Senate, sir, by further remarks on this subject. I am anxious rather to vote than to speak upon it.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, if I understand it right, is to authorize the President in making his contracts, to allow the contractors to begin at a point below the mouth of the Kansas river.

Mr. POLK. As far south as Fort Smith.

Mr. MASON. If this road ever is to be built under the patronage of the General Government, I suspect that it must be done in one of two modes: either by direct appropriations from the Treasury, or upon the credit of the public lands through which the road is to pass. The bill introduced by the honorable Senator from California, and I think followed in the main by those who have offered amendments, provides for both—direct appropriations from the Treasury, and contributions from the public domain. A contribution from the Treasury of $25,000,000 will be but a beginning, and a very small beginning as far as money goes, but the contribution out of the public domain may or may not be really a productive fund, depending upon the value of the lands that may be granted.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator seems to speak of the $25,000,000 as a contribution. Do I understand by that that he means it is a gift to the road which is to draw after it other concessions of a similar character? If so, that is not the bill.

Mr. MASON. I understand the bill perfectly, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. IVERSON. Then the Senator ought to represent it properly.

Mr. MASON. I represent it correctly, as I appreciate it. It is a direct appropriation of $25,000,000 from the Treasury, upon a stipulation that, under certain circumstances, it shall be paid back. The bill speaks for itself, and each gentleman will determine for himself what probability there is, if this sum of $25,000,000 is paid out, that any portion of it will ever come back. I do not believe a penny will.

I was saying, however, that if the road ever is built from contributions made by the Government, I apprehend that the real substantial contribution at last will be in the public domain; and if it is to be undertaken, I should think, with the honorable Senator from Missouri, as well from the chances to get the road built as from justice to all sections of the country, the largest latitude should be given as to the eastern terminus of the road; because it may be found—I do not believe it will be found, but it may be—that lands lying in one section of the immense territory reaching to the Pacific may be more valuable and more productive than others. If a contractor is allowed to choose the route, other things being equal, he certainly would choose that route where he would find the most valuable lands, whether south or north. I should think, therefore, that full latitude should be given upon the scheme of this bill to locate the road wherever this portion of the public contributions shall be found most available, which will depend upon the character of the country through which it is to pass. So much for that.

This bill has been before us frequently before—not this particular bill, but this measure—and in various shapes. According to my recollection, when it was first introduced by an honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] who, all here regret, is no longer with us, it was, as the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] proposes, upon a direct authority to the President to make a contract for the construction of the road. As it is now presented by the honorable Senator from California, the product, as I understand, of a select committee, it is not an authority to the President to construct the road, but it is an authority to the President to make a contract for carrying the mails and the troops, munitions of war and Government supplies, from the eastern States to California, upon a railroad that has no existence, on the expectation that this contract will be of a character to invite the construction of the road. Who is to construct it? The bill does not say whether it is to be constructed by a private operator, or by an associated company, or by a corporation; but it is intended to invite, upon the bonus held out by the bill, an operator or operators from some quarter to construct the road upon payments to be made in advance by the Government, to be retributed at a future day by the use of the road in the manner provided by the bill.

Now, let us look at it. In the first place, it is the commencement of a new policy on the part of this Government. I recollect very well that, at the inauguration of the great system of railroads that has now been carried into successful execution in that part of the country where railroads are wanted, this was a favorite policy more than once presented to Congress, and the argument was this: "As the Government certainly must use the road when it is made, for the purpose of transporting the mail, and must pay for the use of the road in thus transporting the mail, it is not asking a great deal that the Government should enable us the better to construct the road, or the sooner to construct the road, by advancing the capital which will represent the interest they will pay for the transportation of the mails when the work is done." That argument was advanced more than once and in the most plausible manner. It was never, according to my recollection, yielded; but the roads were made without it—roads extending now for thousands of miles, from the extreme of the eastern States to the extreme of the western States—constructed by capital invited from every quarter where the great source of capital is to be found. Why? Because it was believed the investment would be a profitable one to those who entered into it. The Government did nothing except, I think, in some instances, to give a credit for the duties on the railroad iron that was imported for the purpose of constructing the roads.

But now it is asked that the Government shall take the initiative, and by a system of bounties prescribed in advance, shall invite the labor and the capital of the country to construct this road to the Pacific; and what is to be given? In the first place, in money $25,000,000, to be advanced as fast as sections of twenty-five miles of the road are completed, to an amount equal to $12,500 per mile; and the party making the contract, in addition, is to have conveyed to him alternate sections of the public land through which the road shall pass, for its whole length, forty miles wide; that is, twenty miles on each side of the road. Estimating the road at two thousand miles long, which, I believe, is about the average estimate, this would give some twenty-five million six hundred thousand acres of land. This is the bonus that is held out to induce capitalists or contractors to advance their labor or capital in the construction of this road.

I think I understood the honorable Senator from California, who has given to this subject probably more attention than any other gentleman among us, to say in the remarks he submitted the other day, that the average cost of the road—having reference to the various routes contemplated—would be about one hundred million dollars. Well, that is an estimate; but if we can take it as correct and rely upon it, let us see whether any substantial contractor, either in the form of a private or a corporate company, could be found who would in good faith embark seventy-five million or fifty million dollars with the Government's twenty-five million dollars and twenty-five million acres of land, and take a common risk. There are Senators around me who are much better informed of the experience of the railroads of the country, as far as they have gone, than I profess to be, but still I have some information about it; and I think I hazard little in saying, that of the thousands of miles of roads now constructed in every part of this country, connecting the most important points of the Union, north and south, east and west, and passing through the densest population, and those parts of the United States where the great commercial business of the country is transacted, there are very few making returns for the capital invested in them. I think it has been found as the experience of the country, that the transportation of freight upon railroads is more a source of loss than a source of profit. It has also been found, that whatever may be the travel passing over roads between distant points, a road falls speedily into a state of decrepitude, unless it has resources from what is called the way travel or the travel of the country through which the road passes. In other words, no railroad, no matter through what part of the Union it passes, is found in a prosperous condition unless it passes through a densely-populated country, and is sustained by the way travel.

Then I would ask what inducements, what other than illusory inducements, would be held out to any contractor, bona fide, to embark his time, his labor, his capital in copartnership with the Government in the construction of this road, if such is the real experience of the railroads of the country, as far as they have been constructed? I should think very little. Then what would be the result? Why, sir, I must be again allowed to say that, coming from the part of the country from which I come, and accustomed to witness the occupations of the people amongst whom I reside, I have as little knowledge, perhaps less than most Senators around me, of the character and purposes and objects of those who form the great mass of contractors upon public works, the manner in which those works are made, the mode in which persons are invited to bring out capital in aid of their operations, and the results when the capital is brought out and expended; but I think I may say that certainly in every contract with which the Government has anything to do, and to a very great extent in contracts that are under the immediate and exacting supervision of private owners, the result most generally is, that while the contractors are enriched, the capitalists, or those who advance the money, are impoverished. Now, what must be the result, if the Government enters upon this scheme? That it is a desideratum, none can doubt; that it would be a matter that would be fraught with great and beneficial results to the country, none can doubt, if we had a railroad in practical operation connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific States.

The honorable Senator from Missouri has said that the West are not only eager and earnest for it, but are almost demanding it. Doubtless they are; and so is California; and that very earnestness and demand will have the effect, if ever we commence the work, almost to compel the Government to go on with it and to finish it. If it be commenced under the auspices of this bill upon a stipulation to advance only $12,500 per mile, and to give to the contractors alternate sections of land twenty miles wide on each side of the road; hereafter, when it shall be ascertained, as in due time it will necessarily be ascertained, that these advances are utterly inadequate to the construction of the road, and when the credit which may be built up on these public lands shall be exhausted, and the credit of the contractors, whatever it may be, in like manner be exhausted, then this demand will come from the West, and from California, and from other sources, and say: "Well, the Government has not only embarked itself in this enterprise, but it has induced others to embark in it; it has induced them to embark in it on expectations which have not been realized; the contractors are ruined; there is a mass of debt unpaid; the work remains unfinished." Every effort will be made, and successful efforts will be made, after the Government begins it, to make the Government end it; and at last, I may say, without claiming to be any prophet, or capable of any other reasoning than reasoning to the future from the past, the result will inevitably be, cost what it may, that if the road is ever made, it will be made by the public Treasury of the country, and carry with it all that immense system of contracts, and of patronage, and of frauds, which must be ever attendant upon a work of this character in the hands of the Government.

At what time is it now projected? At a time when the business of the country is prostrate, when the resources of the Treasury are dried up, and we are borrowing money—$5,000,000 at a time—to carry on the most economical expenditures of the Government. We have already authorized a loan of $20,000,000. Five million dollars of it, according to my recollection, have been taken up, and $5,000,000 more are now advertised for. If we look at the receipts from the customs we find that they are in truth almost dried up by the paralysis of business in the country. At this time, with a Treasury in this condition, the bill proposes that it shall incur a debt at once of $25,000,000 for the purpose of commencing this Pacific railroad.

I will not say, Mr. President—because if I did I should possibly be laughed at—that I can find no warrant for this project in the Constitution anywhere. The Government is authorized to establish post offices and post roads, and to carry the mails; but it has no further authority on that subject. It is true, as was said by one of the Senators advocating this measure, that if the Government thought it wise and expedient, it might become its own carrier of the mail, but it has never done it; and I suppose it cannot be said it ever was in the contemplation of those who framed the Constitution, or those who have, up to this time, administered it, that the Government had power, under that clause of the Constitution, to build a railroad for the purpose of having the mail carried.

My sincere and thoroughly founded belief is, that if the Government can be induced to touch this scheme with its little finger, it will find itself committed, in all after time, to have the work done, cost what it may—far more if it can be induced to embark in it upon the stipulations contained in any of these bills—to advance money, from time to time, for the construction of the road, and to give the public lands as a source of credit to enable the additional supplies to be obtained. I think, sir, if the bill should be passed into a law, it will be fortunate for the whole community that the great mass of public lands through which the road is to pass are really worthless, and that no credit can be built up upon them; for if a credit could be built up on them proportionate to the demands of the road, we should have acted over again, and in the most exaggerated form, that which we have just passed through, and which is called, I think, in commercial phrase, the great revulsion of the times.

I do not know in what light other Senators have looked at this matter; but I have been most forcibly impressed with the conviction that the revulsion through which we have just passed, and passed to a great extent by actual bankruptcy in wiping off the debt without payment, has resulted from the improvident cessions made of the public lands in the immense northwest country, for the building of speculative railroads. I remember very well to have seen, as doubtless most other gentlemen have, in the condition of things developed during the last twelve months, chiefly in New York, where this credit was acquired, that the great mass of the debt of the country existing at that time and wiped out by actual bankruptcy, arose in the attempt to construct railroads in States not ready for them. The process was a very simple one. The great class of speculators who are to be found everywhere where speculation is to be carried out, made large acquisitions of the public lands—acquisitions that they were enabled to make, getting the lands almost for a song, through that system of bounties instituted in Congress recently, by giving gratuities to all the soldiers who have served even fourteen days, in any of the wars, bringing down the public lands to the lowest possible value. These were sold in the market, and the bounty lands given to the soldiers were quoted every day at eighty or ninety cents per acre, instead of the minimum price of $1 25. They were purchased up by speculators located in the Northwest, and then the next step was to project a railroad, which should give their lands value, on the theory that the lands would give value to the railroad. All that was done, or rather the foundation for it laid, through the improvident cessions of the property of the country, in the shape of bounty lands to railroads.

I do not remember the figures; but I do remember this: that in the great debt of the country which has now been wiped out by a shameless bankruptcy, to a vast extent, a great portion of it was found to be connected with northwestern railroads, and the credits built up by them upon the cessions of the public lands. The process, I believe, was somewhat like this: A company was chartered to make the railroad. The State turned over to it the lands ceded by Congress. They went to work; issued the bonds of the company to get the money, and based these bonds upon the credit of the lands; and when the bubble burst, it was found that additional credits had been built up by borrowing money upon the bonds, and it all went "like the baseless fabric of a vision," as soon as the necessities of the times compelled them to look into the actual condition of their affairs.

I say, then, I should consider it fortunate for the whole country, in case a bill of this kind should pass, if it were found that the lands through which the road is to run are worthless, and that no such system of fraudulent credit can be built up on them; and I suspect that such will be found to be the case.

Then let us see how it is. In the table to which I adverted a few minutes ago, which the honorable Senator from California, with that industry and diligence which we all know belong to him, had compiled from these great volumes of railroad surveys, I have found that the average length of the various routes which have been surveyed (or rather explored, for they have not been surveyed) is about two thousand miles. In that distance of two thousand miles, according to the computation of the explorers, there is an average of some one thousand three hundred or one thousand four hundred miles of country, through which the road is to pass, where the lands are reported to be generally uncultivable, arable soil being found in small areas. It is possible that in the remaining six hundred miles, lands may be found which would enable the contractors to build up a credit to some extent in aid of this Government contribution of money; but it would be to a very small extent. Then one of two things must happen, supposing the road to be carried on: either that the road would break down and be stopped for want of means, or, what is far more probable—indeed, I should say, what would be the necessary alternative—that the Government would be called upon, and would find itself in a condition obligatory to shoulder the whole burden, and to make the road at the public expense directly, if it could be made at all.

The honorable Senator from California has estimated the cost at $100,000,000. I do not claim any right to estimate at all further than from general report and general intelligence. If the road is to be two thousand miles long, the road and the equipment to work it I think might be put with safety nearer two hundred million dollars. Well, after it is done, how is it to be worked? If it is done, either as the property of the contractors, or as the property of the imaginative States to whom it is to be hereafter surrendered, or as the property of the General Government as the residuary legatee of a bankrupt concern, how is it to be worked? If I am correct in my estimate of the experience of the railroads at present in operation, it cannot be worked from any avails to be derived from the road. The road will not contribute money enough to work it. It cannot do it; it will have no way travel; it will have comparatively no travel upon it except those who are passing between the Pacific and the Atlantic termini, and such freight as would be brought over it, amounting to what I do not know. But I know, in looking to the experience of the roads which have been made, that a road through a country of that character, and of that extent, could not be expected to be able to pay its own expenses. Hence, if it is to be worked at all, it is to be worked at the expense of the Government.

Well, Mr. President, what sort of a Government should we have then? It is very difficult to say what sort of a Government we have now. It is very easy for gentlemen to see the successive departures from the line and theory and the policy of the Government as we received it, but it is very difficult to say what form of government has resulted when all these departures have exercised their necessary influence upon the administration of affairs. But, if we had a railroad two thousand miles long, passing through a country the greater part of the way always to be desolate of population, to be worked at the public expense, I should appeal to honorable Senators who have looked closely and jealously and justly at any extension of the existing patronage of the Government, to see what a fruitful crop would come in from a railroad administered by this Government—a crop more fruitful in patronage and corruption than all the custom-houses and post offices of this broad land. I am free to admit that I can see nothing but that necessary result if the road ever could be made by the Government, and to be administered of necessity by the Government as a bankrupt road—a road dependent upon public expenditure to carry it on.

I said that, according to the table presented by the honorable Senator from California, there were fourteen hundred miles of uncultivated land on the line of this road. The honorable Senator from Missouri says that one of the explorers, Lieutenant Whipple, has traced a southern route, where you would pass very few miles, at any point, without finding wood and water and grass. That is a very different account of the country from what has been given to us, not only by the explorers, but by the philosophers who know the physical causes that are operating upon that country; and who have a theory—and a theory that is carried into fact, by its existing condition—that the greater portion of it can never be otherwise than a desert, simply because the rain never falls upon it, or falls in such small quantities as to preclude the possibility of having a stable population. The nomadic tribes that wander through it, and who have wandered through it for centuries long before our ancestors came here, were necessarily nomadic in their habits, from the impossibility of having a fixed residence. They were like the tribes in the deserts of Arabia. They would go from oasis to oasis. A shower falls in particular regions of the country, and brings up the grass, and the buffaloes go there, and the Indians go after them; and when it is exhausted they go off to another spot, where another shower has fallen and brought up more grass, and to which the buffaloes come. The great mass of the country must remain, from physical causes always to operate, a desert waste, unfit for the habitation of man. Such is its present condition; such, as long as physical causes remain, as they always have, stable in their character, must ever be its condition. And you are to carry this railroad through fourteen hundred miles of such a country, in order that we may at once effect a connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific States.

Mr. President, I can hardly look at the consequence that would follow upon the enactment of this bill into a law. The improvident waste of money would be as nothing, however many hundred millions it might cost; but it is the unsettling, the loosening, the destroying of the fabric of the Government itself that we are to look to. If the Government should embark itself in this system of patronage and expenditure in the loose manner in which all such expenditures must be conducted, it would debauch the morals of this people beyond recovery. It would be the fruitful parent of a hundred more of these schemes which would be devised only for the purpose of plunder, and would lead to nothing but plunder. We have gone far enough already, I should think, in the use that has been made of the public property by the cessions to railroads, under the delusive idea that we were improving the value of the public domain in giving them to these corporations. Now, we are to go this further step under the illusion of making a contract with a company that does not exist in order to invite such a company into existence, to invite the construction of this road, and to accompany this great cession of the public domain with direct contributions from the Treasury to the amount of $25,000,000. I confess that I am unable to foresee what its results would be in breaking down the Confederate Government, or in converting it into one of entire consolidation.

I shall deem it my duty, sir, to oppose this bill and every kindred one which contemplates either money or lands from the public Treasury to build a railroad. I have opposed them all heretofore by my vote, and occasionally in debate, even when presented in a far less dangerous form; but if we are to go into this system of legislation, placing the money and the property of the Government in the hands of contractors without security, and without the possibility of getting security, bringing a whole swarm of speculators, and all the speculative minds and speculative interests of the country to the door of the Treasury, we shall certainly never satiate them, and the consequence must be that the Government will become a Government administered, if not by, exclusively for the benefit of, speculators and monopolists; to advance which I shall contribute nothing by any vote of mine.

Mr. GWIN. Before the Senator from Virginia sits down, I should like him to indicate what plan would meet with his support, that would bring about a connection by land between the Pacific coast and the rest of the States of this Union. I desire to know whether he contemplates, or is willing to support, any plan which would give us that kind of connection, which would enable us to pass from one section to the other in time of war.

Mr. MASON. I will answer the Senator with great pleasure. I will say to him that I do not think there is any feasible plan that could be devised in any mode, looking to the condition of the country, unless we could find some body, corporate or real, with capital and resources enough to build the road and to pay all its expenses afterwards; and, therefore, I do not think there is any feasible plan by which it can be done. But I will say further, that I am aware of no plan by which it ought to be done, with any other aid from the Federal Government except that which is extended to all railroads that can be advantageously used by the Government, after they have been made from other resources; and the Government should not be a party to them.

Mr. GWIN. Then I understand the Senator to say, that he advises no plan, proposes no plan, for this connection, and hence there must be an inevitable separation of this Union in the event of war with a powerful nation, by the connection being cut off between the various sections of the Republic, for the want of just such a communication as it is now proposed to make by this bill, as a great military necessity. I shall understand him, then, as taking the position that the Pacific coast is to be separated from the rest of the Union, if, unfortunately, we should have a war with any nation more powerful at sea than we are, so as to cut off our oceanic communication; and that he will not attempt, in time of peace, to make any provision by which the Republic can be kept with its present boundaries in the event of the casualty of war.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator seems to import that I have a better opinion of the region of country from which he comes than he has himself. I have no idea that there is any nation on earth powerful enough to take possession of our Pacific coast, and keep it against this Government, unless—what I am sure he would not wish to be done—the Pacific country assented. It is very possible, that in a war with any great maritime Power, they might pounce down upon and take possession of some of the Pacific cities; I do not know that they could even do that. I do not know but that those cities might be able to protect themselves, with such means as the Government may have there; but I am very far from admitting that even if they were temporarily taken, it would necessarily dismember this Confederacy. If I remember rightly, in 1814 the British army were in possession, for a very long time, of portions of some of the New England States—I think of the State of Maine; yet it was never supposed that the Government had been dismembered, because we could not dislodge the enemy.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator, therefore, as we are the weakest, and most remote section of the country, invites that our country shall be taken possession of by foreign nations. He would leave us unprotected, while his own section is entirely protected by the power of the Government having been heretofore exerted to develop its resources, and to so connect it with the rest of the Confederacy that an immense force could be concentrated for its defense, which makes it impossible for an enemy now, no matter what was done in 1814, to hold any portion of this Confederacy, with the solitary exception of the Pacific coast. All we ask is to give us military connection with this section of the Confederacy; and if the Senator can devise a better plan than this bill I am for it. This is no favorite of mine. I am for having a plan by which we can be connected with this section of the Confederacy, so that we can be as a nation ought to be—able to assist each section of it, no matter what portion of it may be invaded by a foreign foe, if we ever have a war.

Mr. MASON. I do not choose that the Senator from California shall change the issue, so far as I am concerned. I would not permit a foreign enemy to take possession of our country. What I said was, that, at most, I presumed they could only get possession for the time being, when California even becomes stronger than she is now, of some points on the coast. But if the Senator means to present this alternative that we must either part with California as a State in this Confederacy, or change and destroy the fabric of this Government, in order to build a railroad to connect them, with every regret in the world in parting with the country of the honorable Senator, I should be constrained to say it must go. I would say to the Senator, however, on this subject of military supplies, it is hardly probable that we are likely to have such a war, certainly for half a century, if not longer, and it is possible that in that time it may be found practicable to throw all military supplies, to any amount, both of men and of munitions, across this very desert country, by the means of very large camel trains, and we may give them a camel train as a substitute for his railroad.

Mr. HALE. I will remind the Senator from Virginia that, in his reminiscences of the last war, he need not have gone all the way down East to find a country that the British got possession of, because I believe we are standing in a place now that they held a little while. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. That is true.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We want a railroad to bring the people from California to defend it the next time.

Mr. HALE. But, sir, I rose rather for information, and, as I do not like the mode of putting interrogatories directly to a gentleman, I will throw them out in general, and let anybody who feels inclined to answer do so. I am in favor of a Pacific railroad, but I am not going to say when or how. I am in favor of it, probably, on some 4th of July; but, when we undertake to build it, we must have reference to all the surroundings; and not the least important, it strikes me, is the state of the Treasury.

I understand that there will be a bill here before long to borrow $30,000,000, before we get through the session. I am told that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that, with extraordinary economy, if we shall be careful, as he will be, he may get along with borrowing $20,000,000; and the question I want to ask will grow out of the statement of facts I am now going to make.

I see it stated in various papers; in such a manner that I am inclined to give some credit to it, that it is the intention of the Administration, as soon as they get the Kansas bill off their hands, to give their attention to another subject, which will involve a very large expenditure of the public treasure—and that is the purchase of Cuba. We all know that when Mr. Buchanan was Secretary of State under Mr. Polk, he instructed Mr. Saunders, who was then our Minister to Spain, to offer $200,000,000 for Cuba, and he could not get it. Spain would not sell for that price. In addition to what I have seen in the papers, which seemed to me to be authentic, I have read an extract from a speech—which I did not hear delivered—by a gentleman of whom I may say, that when I hear him speak, I think I hear Mr. Buchanan. I refer to the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL.] He says that he was in favor, some time ago, of assisting what are commonly called the filibusters in taking Cuba. but he has abandoned that, and thinks everybody ought to give that up, and to entertain another view. I will read his very words. He said, this day a week ago:

"When I made, four years since, a movement for the suspension of our neutrality laws, I believed, as I now believe, that a large majority of the people of Cuba was prepared to make a vigorous effort to throw off the yoke of their transatlantic oppressors."

That evidently does not refer to a slave insurrection. That was not the kind of yoke to be thrown off:

"And, so far as my influence of councils could be useful, I was willing to aid them. I believed then, as I now believe, that a hostile feeling towards us then existed with the Governments of France and Great Britain, and that they desired to Africanize Cuba. I avail myself, gladly, of the occasion to say that such, I am satisfied, is not now the feeling of these Governments."

That is, they are not opposed to our taking Cuba now.

"Besides this, the people of Cuba, although still desirous of peaceful annexation, are not willing to run the risk of civil war and servile insurrection to become members of our Confederacy. Public policy must accommodate itself to circumstances; and any attempt to obtain Cuba, except by negotiation, should, in my opinion, now be abandoned."

I do not mean to ask the question; but if the Senator from Virginia will answer, I should like to have him answer whether or not it is the intention of the Administration to open that negotiation again, and to offer anything like the amount heretofore offered for Cuba? Because, if so, however much we should like a Pacific railroad bill, we shall not have $100,000,000 to spare in the present state of our Treasury, after we have paid $200,000,000 for Cuba; and it would enlighten, I have no doubt, the judgment of some men on this measure. I will not say how much influence it would have on my own vote, but it would enlighten the judgment of some before they vote for what would involve the Government in the expense of $100,000,000, to know whether it is to be taken out of a Treasury that has been depleted $200,000,000 by the purchase of Cuba, or not; because I think, notwithstanding all that the Senator from Missouri has said of the greatness and the power and the enterprise of this country, it would hardly be competent to both these undertakings.

Mr. POLK. The Senator will allow me to say, not at one time. Let us have the railroad first; and then, if we can take the other afterwards, very well.

Mr. HALE. That is the very thing I wanted to hear the Senator from Virginia upon: which goes first of these two, the Pacific railroad or Cuba? If Cuba is really the object of the Administration, (and to be serious about it, I think the Administration owe it to the people to let it be known whether this is their intention,) this is their object, and this is a part of the settled policy of the Government; because it is evident that it must very sensibly influence the action of those who look to the condition of the Treasury to govern them in the vote they are to give on the proposition now before the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, before the question is taken on the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Missouri, I desire to offer an amendment to his amendment. His amendment, if I understand it, is, that the point of starting shall be between the mouth of the Big Sioux river and Fort Smith, on the western boundary of Arkansas. The amendment which I propose is, that the northern point shall be on the western boundary of Minnesota, at Breckinridge, at the confluence of the Bois des Sioux with the Red River of the North. It is a point for a railroad to which a grant of land has already been given to Minnesota. It is upon the line of the proposed road as surveyed by Governor Stevens; and it is, in my judgment, upon that route which is capable of settlement upon the entire line up the Missouri river and down the Columbia river, and capable of being inhabited, and thickly inhabited, across the entire continent. On that route there is no desert plain of five hundred miles, or of one thousand five hundred miles; but at the very summit of the dividing ridge there is scarce five miles from a good pasture on the one side to good pasture on the other. I simply offer this amendment so that the question may be taken between these two points—Breckinridge, at the confluence of the Bois des Sioux and the Red River of the North, and Fort Smith on the south.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am very certain the Senate is not now prepared for a vote on this subject. I may also say that I am not myself prepared to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It reaches, in its effects, my own State very materially. I have been disinclined to make any expression of opinion in regard to this subject. I have been so disinclined in consequence of the fact that I have really had no time to look into the question hitherto since the bill was first reported at this session. I sincerely desire to look into it somewhat. If I am forced to vote now on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri, with the other amendment which has been proposed to it, which makes it still more offensive, I believe, as far as I am individually concerned, I shall certainly vote against it. Although I can imagine very readily that gentlemen from the State of Missouri may suppose that I might vote for it, I certainly shall not do so at present advised. I may be wrong in the impressions that are on my mind now. I desire to examine the question; and I have had no opportunity to do so heretofore. If there is no disposition to discuss it longer, (and I have not been disposed to cut off discussion myself, in any way, by making any motion,) I hope the Senate will adopt the motion which I beg leave now to submit, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. IVERSON. Before that question is taken, I desire to offer some amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is an amendment and an amendment to an amendment now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) Further amendments are not now in order.

Mr. YULEE. Will a postponement interfere with the special order for to-morrow, the Private Calendar, which, I think, ought to be then taken up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a motion interferes with no pending question for to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the vote is taken I wish to give notice of an amendment in addition to the one I moved yesterday, and that is to amend the seventh section of the bill at the twenty-eighth line by striking out the residue of the section after the word "provided" and inserting:

That all the iron necessary to construct said railroad, and which may compose the track of the same, shall be of American manufacture.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is a strong disposition with a number of Senators, as we have fixed upon the day for the final adjournment of Congress, (and I believe it very appropriate,) that we shall dispose of some business on the Private Calendar. To-morrow, it is true, is the regular day for private bills; but that we may have some time to consider the question that has just been postponed, and devote some attention and study to it, I should like very much to have an adjournment over until Monday next. With that view I wish to say that I will proceed directly to move that we take up the Private Calendar. In the mean time, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. IVERSON. I trust that motion will not prevail. The Private Calendar has not been touched this session. It contains many cases; and some of them, within my knowledge, of a very hard character, which really deserve the attention of Congress. We have resolved to adjourn finally on the 7th of June. Unless we sit every day in the week, and sit a good many hours of each day, I am satisfied that the public business will not be done. We ought, as we have agreed to adjourn on the 7th of June, at least to show a willingness to work during the time we have left. If we adjourn over from Thursday to Monday of every week, and then adjourn finally on the 7th of June, two months earlier than is usual, what will the country say of us? I trust the motion will not prevail. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator thinks that, if we adjourn from Thursday until Monday every week, to the end of the session, we shall lose a great deal of time. This is not a proposition of that kind. I do not expect, from now to the end of the session, to support another such motion; but we have before us a bill which all the members of the Senate, as far as I understand—and I know very well it is so in regard to myself—have had no time to consider. It is a subject of vast importance, and should be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. IVERSON. The Private Calendar comes up to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am aware of that; and I state to the Senator that, if the motion be adopted to adjourn from Thursday until Monday, which will give us the opportunity I and others desire to examine the railroad bill, I shall move to-day to proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar. I hope the Senate will then take up the Private Calendar, and consider it. I do not look on the Private Calendar, at the present time, as so exceedingly urgent that we should refuse to allow ourselves time to consider so great and important a public measure as the California railroad bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, we have been in session, I think, very nearly four months and a half. No single day has been devoted to the Private Calendar in all that time. There has been ordinarily, early in the session, a resolution adopted, I do not know but that it is a rule now, allowing private bills to be considered on Friday of each week. Days are as important to the other House as weeks are to us. The rules which govern that body, and the number which constitute the body, do not allow it to dispose of business as readily as we ourselves. If, on to-morrow, we can meet and devote the day to the consideration of private claims, we shall forward them to that body one week earlier than we shall if we postpone our action until Friday of next week. I too, with the Senator from Georgia, can say that I know there are many cases of private claims of very great merit—claims which involve an obligation upon us, in my opinion, to consider and to pass them or to reject them, as our judgment shall lead us when we have investigated them. I sincerely hope we shall not adjourn over to-morrow. But seven weeks more of the session remain, and I had hoped, when we fixed the day of final adjournment, we should do two things here: stop making long speeches, and go to work. I will make no long speech; I want to work.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hannond, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, and Vance—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, and Wright—35.

So the motion was rejected.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. F. CARTER, Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses upon the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, and had appointed Messrs. W. H. ENGLISH, of Indiana, A. H. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and W. A. HOWARD, of Michigan, as managers at the conference on its part.

COMMANDER THOMAS J. PAGE.

Mr. MASON. There are two little bills on the Calendar for the relief of Commander Page, of the Navy. He is about to leave the country, and I ask the Senate to take them up. They are very small in amount. They have been reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they both passed the Senate at the last session. It is his earnest desire that they shall be adjusted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. To-morrow is private bill day, and we shall have all these matters up then. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion until we pass these bills. They will not occupy five minutes.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

The motion of Mr. MASON was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of Thomas J. Page was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and adjust the account of Commander T. J. Page, of the Navy, for his expenses in preparing his accounts as acting purser of the United States brig Dolphin; but the amount to be paid is not to exceed seventy-five dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. MASON. The report is long, or longer perhaps than the subject would authorize in this: Mr. Page, as the commander of the steamer Water Witch, in South America, was made to act as purser, and he asked to be allowed a sum of money to compensate him for that service. The great body of the report disallows it, and he is not allowed that. He asked further that he should be allowed for his expenses in having his accounts prepared for settlement as purser, and that was allowed, so the great mass of the report disallows what he asks. The concluding paragraph is that which allows what the bill gives him, and if the Senator desires it, I will read that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would ask the Senator at what time Commander Page is to leave the country? Why is it necessary that we should take up this bill at this time, out of its order?

Mr. MASON. He has been ordered, as probably the Senator knows, to the same station in South America where he was before, and is to leave in the course of a very short time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. When is he to leave?

Mr. MASON. I do not know. Probably in one, two, or three weeks.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then we have plenty of time to hear the report read. If he were compelled to leave to-morrow I should be willing to take the bill on the Senator's word, without hearing the report.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to its being read, but it disallows the claim to a great extent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the following report made by Mr. MALLORY on the 18th of February:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Lieutenant Thomas J. Page, of the United States Navy, asking to be allowed the pay of a purser for the time during which he commanded the United States brig Dolphin, and performed purser's duties on board said vessel, has had the same under consideration, and thereupon submit the following report:

The memorialist alleges that "in October, 1849, while on the East India station, he was appointed to the command of the brig Dolphin, and with the command was united the appointment also of purser." He then proceeds to state that he performed the duties of purser on board said vessel, and adjusted his accounts with the Government as an acting purser; and he submits an account of the time so employed, and for which he claims compensation at the rate of $1,500 per annum, making the sum $3,057 92. He does not claim to have been a purser, or to have received any appointment as purser or as an acting purser, but that he was appointed to command the brig, and that "with the command was united the appointment also of purser."

Your committee have given to the memorialist's claim very careful examination, with the view of affording him the relief he seeks, if it can be granted consistently with the existing laws and usages of the Navy on the subject; and your committee is aware that many other officers of this branch of the public service have occupied similar positions, and performed similar services, and that their claims also are involved in its action.

The records of the Navy Department show that for a very long period it has been the practice of the Secretary of the Navy to direct the commanders of brigs, and other smaller vessels, to perform purser's duties, in addition to those of commander. The duties of supervising the financial concerns of the vessels generally have long been, and still are, considered incident to the command of such vessels, when the exigencies of the public service do not admit of their having a regular purser. Before the year 1835, officers commanding and thus performing purser's duties were permitted to purchase their own "slops," &c., and to charge a profit upon the articles furnished to their crews; but the act of March 3, 1835, (see Statutes at Large, vol. 4, page 737,) precluded officers of the Navy from receiving any incidental allowances, except for traveling expenses, and for the performance of the duties of a superior grade. In lieu of incidental allowances their pay proper was greatly augmented. As an example, the aggregate pay and subsistence of a lieutenant on sea-service was raised from $965 to $1,573, and that of a lieutenant commanding (the case of the memorialist) from $1,176 to $1,873; and it was considered that this increase of pay would compensate for such "extra" services as had previously been separately charged for.

Your committee is not aware that any lieutenant commanding has ever received any extra allowance for attending to the duties of purser on board of his vessel; and when the memorialist took command of the Dolphin, both the law and the practice of the Department under it were in operation.

But in addition to the act just cited, the Army appropriation act of August 23, 1842, directing that—

"No officer of any branch of the public service shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or any other service or duty whatsoever, unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation."

The twelfth section of the act of the 26th August, 1842, is in these words:

"No allowance or compensation shall be made to any clerk or other officer by reason of the discharge of duties which belong to any other clerk or officer in the same or any other department, and no allowance shall be made for any extra services whatever, which any clerk or other officer may be required to perform."

The third section of the act of 3d March, 1839, is in these words:

"No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salaries or whose pay or emoluments is or are fixed by law and regulations, shall receive any extra allowance or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or the performance of any service, unless the said extra allowance or compensation be authorized by law."—Statutes at Large, vol. 5, page 349.

The act of 30th September, 1840, (United States Statutes at Large, volume —, pages 542-43,) declares that "hereafter the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, or other pay officers of the United States, shall in no case allow any pay to one individual the salaries of two different offices on account of having performed the duties thereof at the same time. But this prohibition shall not extend to the superintendents of the executive buildings."

The design of the legitimate construction of these acts cannot admit of a doubt.

But the memorialist claims that he held two distinct offices, and exercised the duties of both, and is entitled to receive the pay of both; and he submits an extract from a decision of Chief Justice Taney, delivered in the case of "The United States vs. Joseph White," in the circuit court, Maryland district, 1851, and also extracts from an opinion of Attorney General Crittenden, June 7, 1851, in support of his claim.

It is evident to your committee that the memorialist did not hold two distinct offices. The duties of a purser on board of small vessels like the Dolphin were incident to those of commander, and compensation, in lieu of a distinct and separate allowance for them, had previously been made by law. That such incidental services afford no foundation for a claim for extra compensation was evidently the opinion of the chief justice in the case cited. He says:

"A Navy agent, therefore, (and the principle is equally applicable to any other officer), is not entitled to compensation beyond his salary as fixed by law for any extra services, although such services may be out of the district for which he is appointed, and may more properly appertain to the duties of another Navy agent, or even to an officer of the Government filling an office of a different character. His salary is the only compensation for services required of him and performed by him if he holds no other office or appointment."

The memorialist was not a purser; he pretends no appointment as purser; the duties of purser were incident to the command of the Dolphin; and they were discharged by "an officer of the Government filling an office of a different character."

The memorialist is not entitled, in the judgment of your committee, to the relief he claims. He alleges that, in the preparation of his accounts, in the various forms required by the practice of the accounting officers of the Treasury, he expended about seventy-five dollars. A reasonable allowance should be made for this expenditure. A naval officer cannot be presumed to be conversant with the accurate details so necessary in the preparation and adjustment of long standing accounts beyond the sphere of his ordinary and legitimate duties; and your committee report a bill for the relief of the memorialist to this extent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have no doubt in the world, from the reading of the report, that the bill ought to be passed. I think the evidence to establish the claim is amply sufficient.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the bill (S. No. 159) for the relief of Commander Thomas J. Page, of the United States Navy, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will be a direction to the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to Commander Page, in the adjustment of his accounts as purser of the United States steamer Water Witch, credit for certain suspended items of accounts, not to exceed the sum of $354 46.

In addition to the duties of commander of the ship, he was ordered to perform those of purser, though he expressly requested to be relieved from them, because of his want of familiarity with them and with accounts generally. He was not even allowed a clerk by the Department. The extent of country to be explored, both by land and water, necessarily involved, at various times, not only a separation of portions of the officers and "ship's company" from the vessel, but also made it necessary that the petitioner himself should be absent for periods of from one to six months. If he had remained on board, to attend in person to the duties of purser, he could not have properly discharged, under his instructions, the more important duties of the expedition, and, in obeying his instructions, he was necessarily compelled to intrust to others not only the command of the vessel, but the discharge of the purser's duties also. From the diversified character of the duties thus devolved upon him, it necessarily followed that the accounts rendered were very numerous. Notwithstanding this, there is not the expenditure of the smallest amount of money which has not been fully accounted for, nor a bill contracted which has not been recognized as made under the authority of his instructions.

The losses incurred, and for which he is held responsible, arise from payments made to sailors who deserted from the vessel in debt to the Government; from errors made by the purser's steward (on whom he was compelled greatly to rely) in the calculation of the sailors' terms of service; from errors in a bill of exchange; from errors made by the steward in the calculations, &c. During the three years and five months the petitioner disbursed $112,000 in money, and about $10,000 in provisions and clothing. The whole has been faithfully accounted for. The money for which he is held responsible was not spent contrary to law, but through ignorance, in part, of regulations with which he could not have been supposed to be familiar, inasmuch as they did not relate to his duties proper, and he knew nothing of their existence, and, in part, through errors of the steward, in whom, as above stated, he was necessarily obliged to confide much in the calculation of accounts. The statements of the petitioner are fully sustained by his oath, and also by the certificate of Lieutenant William N. Jeffers, one of the officers on the expedition. The items disallowed amount to $354 46; and, under the circumstances of the case, the Naval Committee, satisfied that Commander Page acted faithfully and with his best abilities for the public interest, think he should have those credits allowed in the adjustment of his accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLMENT OF VESSELS.

Mr. CLAY. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 127) to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment and license to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825, have directed me to report the bill back without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to have that bill passed.

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection. It is a bill in which the Senator is interested.

Mr. SEWARD. The registry act obliges small canal boats that come down the Pennsylvania coal canal and the Erie canal of New York to be registered, and it requires an oath to be taken, and that oath is prescribed in such language that the canal companies cannot register their vessels without swearing not only that they belong to them, and that no officer or director is a foreigner, but that no stockholder in the company is a foreigner. The bill is simply to remove that latter difficulty.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar, and take up the bills to which there shall be no objection. If any objection be urged to any bill which shall be reached on the Calendar, let that bill go over until to-morrow. In this way we may get rid of a good many bills on the Private Calendar to which there is no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I interpose no objection to that; but before that motion is put, I hope the Senator will allow me to call up a little bill in relation to regulating boats at custom-houses, which is connected somewhat with the bill that has just been passed.

Mr. IVERSON. Is it likely to give rise to discussion?

Mr. HAMLIN. It will not occupy three minutes, I am sure.

Mr. IVERSON. I yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to amend section thirty-seven of the act of February 18, 1793, so as to read:

"That nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to any boat or lighter not being masted, or if masted and not decked, employed on any of the rivers or canals or in the harbor of any town or city."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of such bills on the Private Calendar as shall not give rise to debate.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH CHASE AND OTHERS.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 78) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue land warrants to Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to issue to Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef, of the State of Rhode Island, respectively, a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, in consideration of their detention as prisoners in the Dartmoor prison during a portion of the years 1814 and 1815.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE SMITH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 87) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Jane Smith, of the county of Clermont, State of Ohio.

Mr. PUGH. Let it lie over.

LUCINDA ROBINSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 88) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Lucinda Robinson, of the county of Orleans, State of Vermont.

Mr. PUGH. That involves the same question as the preceding bill. Let it lie over.

GEORGE ASHLEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 89) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased.

Mr. IVERSON. That bill was objected to when it was up before. It had better go over.

JOHN ERICSSON.

The next was the bill (S. No. 90) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of John Ericsson.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let that go over.

CREEK DEPREDACTIONS.

The next was the bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians.

Mr. HALE. Let that go over.

NAHUM WARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 93) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Nahum Ward, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. IVERSON. Let that bill go over.

ELIZABETH MONTGOMERY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 30) for the relief of Elizabeth Montgomery, heir of Hugh Montgomery.

Mr. CLAY. I must object to considering that bill.

Mr. BAYARD. That bill was before the Senate on a former occasion. It was under consideration; the report was read. I hope it will not be passed over now.

Mr. CLAY. It will come up to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. Why not let it come up now?

Mr. CLAY. Because I wish to read the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A single objection carries it over under the order of the Senate.

AGATHA O'BRIEN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 101) for the relief of Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. J. O'Brien, late of the United States Army.

It provides for the payment to Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, of such sums of money as may be found due to her late husband, as captain of artillery, from the 31st of December, 1849, when he was last paid, to the 31st of March, 1850, the day of his death, and for balancing his accounts on the books of the Treasury.

The memorialist states "that her late husband was assistant quartermaster United States Army from 1847 to the time of his death, and, as such, disbursed large sums of public money at various places, particularly at Camargo, Mexico, and Indianola, Texas. While actually in the performance of his duties, he was seized with cholera and died after a few hours' illness, at Indianola, on March 31, 1850, necessarily leaving his accounts in a very unsettled condition. Upon a settlement of his accounts at the Treasury, a balance of about seven hundred dollars stands charged against him, while his pay and emoluments, for the quarter ending on the day he died, are to his credit, $335 50. The memorialist prays for the passage of an act for her relief, directing the balance to the debit of her late husband be canceled, and that the quarter's pay due him on March 31, 1850, be paid to him."

The Military Committee, in investigating this case, find the facts to be substantially as stated in the memorial, except that Major O'Brien is also largely indebted to the United States, since 1847, on property account. But in view of the circumstances of his sudden death; that he was ever zealous and scrupulous in the discharge of his duty; that he was a brave and gallant officer; that he leaves a widow and children in a destitute condition, they report a bill for the relief of the memorialist.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS PHENIX, JR.

The bill (S. No. 102) for the relief of Thomas Phenix, jr., was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to authorize the Secretary of War to pay to Thomas Phenix, jr., during the time he was acting as paymaster's clerk, in the employment of D. Randall, deputy paymaster general, the sum of three dollars a day, deducting therefrom the sum of $500 per annum already received by him.

The petitioner, during the war with Mexico, was employed by D. Randall, deputy paymaster general, as his clerk, and received his regular pay of $500 per annum for a little more than two years. The disbursements of the deputy paymaster general at New Orleans were very heavy, and would have justified the employment of extra clerks. The expense of additional clerks, however, was saved to the Government by the extraordinary efforts of the petitioner, under the assurances of the deputy paymaster that he should be allowed an increased compensation for these services, which increased compensation has been allowed to many other paymasters' clerks under the same circumstances. The justice and equity of this claim are acknowledged by the paymaster general and by the Secretary of War. The latter officer admits that if Colonel Randall had paid the increased compensation now claimed, it would have been allowed by the Department, as being in strict accordance with law.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SIMON DE VISSER AND JOSÉ VILLARUBIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S.

103) for the relief of Simon de Visser and José Villarubia, of New Orleans.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have written to New Orleans for some information on the subject of this bill; and if it be of the character I expect, it is probable I shall interpose no objection. I should like it to go over to-day, with the consent of the Senator who reported it. I ask that it be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. TOOMBS. Of course; with the understanding that it be taken up to-morrow, it may go over.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am not satisfied at present that it ought to pass, but I think that in a few days I shall be able to say to the Senator from Georgia, that I have no objection. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The bill was passed over.

O. H. BERRYMAN AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 108) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of O. H. Berryman and others.

Mr. IVERSON. That is objected to.

MOSES NOBLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 109) from the Court of Claims for the relief of Moses Noble.

Mr. CLAY. I object to that.

JOHN M'VEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 53) for the relief of John McVey, which had been reported upon adversely by the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ordinary question in these cases is on the indefinite postponement of the bill. The Chair will put that question if no objection be made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If there is a report in regard to it let it be read. I have no objection to its being rejected, if there is no good ground on which to support the bill; but I should like to hear the report, stating the reasons of the committee for their action.

Mr. TOOMBS. Let it lie over.

The bill was passed over.

LIEUTENANT NATHANIEL WEEKS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 113) for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Nathaniel Weeks, deceased.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that bill.

The bill was passed over.

AMISTAD CASE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 114) to indemnify the master and owners of the Spanish schooner Amistad and her cargo.

Mr. FOOT objected to the bill; and it was passed over.

J. HOSFORD SMITH.

The next was the bill (S. No. 115) for the relief of J. Hosford Smith.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] to this bill. I think a bill for the same purpose was referred only yesterday to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; let this bill be passed over. Yesterday a similar proposition was referred to the Committee on Commerce; and I suppose is under their consideration now.

The bill was laid aside.

JEREMIAH PENDERGAST.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, next proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 116) for the relief of Jeremiah Pendergast, of the District of Columbia. It proposes to place his name on the pension roll at six dollars a month from September 4, 1856, to continue during his life, in lieu of his present pension.

Mr. TOOMBS. Read the report in that case.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Let it lie over, then.

The bill was passed over.

JOHN SCOTT AND HIS SURETIES.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 118) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House, and Samuel O. House.

Its design is to release John Scott, principal, and Hill W. House and Samuel O. House, sureties, from a judgment recovered against them by the United States, on the 4th of April, 1855, in the district court for the northern district of Florida, upon a contract awarded to John Scott, for carrying the mail upon route No. 3503, from New Orleans to Key West, from January 15, 1853, to June 30, 1855.

Mr. HALE. I should like to hear the reason for that bill. Let the report be read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Let it lie over if the reading of the report is called for.

Mr. YULEE. The report is very brief, and I presume the Senator from Arkansas will have no objection to its reading.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Very well.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. YULEE on the 2d of February:

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of John Scott, beg leave to report:

That the memorialist seeks relief from a judgment obtained against him and his sureties for failing to carry into operation a contract for the conveyance of the mail on route No. 3503, from New Orleans to Key West.

It appears that, in 1852, an advertisement was issued inviting proposals for conveying the mail by sea between New Orleans and Key West, and that the contract was awarded to the said Scott for the sum of $20,000.

The route was a new one, and never having been in operation, it was difficult to estimate the worth of the service, and the sum proposed by Scott proved, by the subsequent experience of the Department, to be vastly less than was necessary for the support of the route.

This fact, however, is not adverted to as a basis for the relief of the petitioner, but as explanatory, in part, of the difficulty he experienced in organizing the means to carry his contract into effect as promptly as might otherwise have been practicable. Immediately upon being informed that the contract was awarded to him, the petitioner proceeded diligently to prepare for its execution; and, in his efforts to obtain steamships suitable for the purpose, he visited New Orleans, and all the principal northern cities as far as Portland. Finding it impossible to obtain suitable steamers at any reasonable price, and the limited interval for commencing service not affording time to build them, he applied for, and obtained, an extension of time until the 1st of March. He alleges, further, that, having been unfortunately taken sick at Washington, he was unable to continue his efforts, and did not succeed in effecting an arrangement for a suitable steamer until the middle of March, when he arranged with Captain Montgomery, who had a new steamer nearly completed at Baltimore, and informed the Department of the arrangement, and that the service would be commenced in five weeks.

Before the expiration of that time, the Department gave the contract to Samuel S. Green, for $25,000 per annum, and instituted a suit against the petitioner for damages, which suit resulted in the judgment from which he seeks relief.

The contract was made December 9, 1852, and required the commencement of service on the 15th of January following, an interval of only five weeks. The petitioner appears to have employed that very brief time diligently in the endeavor to obtain a suitable steamer, and having failed, obtained an extension of six weeks more; but, in the meanwhile, being prostrated by sickness, he was disabled from pursuing his object, and did not effect an arrangement until a few days after the expiration of the time.

Upon an investigation of the history of the service since that time, it appears that no real damage was caused to the Government, for the price at which the contract was awarded would have been totally insufficient to sustain the service.

It seems that the contract was transferred, first, to James C. Green, for $25,000 per annum, who, after performing the service very irregularly for a few months, failed, and it was relet to W. C. Templeton, for $42,000, who also performed the service very irregularly; that it was afterwards let to E. G. Rogers & Co., for $41,000, who also failed, and the contract was successively refused by two parties at $48,000; that it was then let to J. M. Howell & Co., for $70,000, who likewise failed to put the service in operation; afterwards to John B. Camden, at the same rate, who failed; and, finally, to the present contractors for $70,000, and no damages have been sought against either of these other parties. Taking into view that the route is a new one, and that it was, therefore, difficult to estimate the proper value of the service; that the petitioner proceeded in perfect good faith, and with great activity and devotion, and at a good deal of personal expense, to give effect to his engagement; and that his failure to commence the service within the brief time allotted, was owing to a providential visitation, which prostrated him with sickness in the midst of his efforts; and that he had, in fact, notified the Department of his having made suitable arrangements before the contract was transferred to Green; and considering, further, that the experience of the service has demonstrated that it was not possible to be performed for any sum approaching that at which the contract was awarded; and that no damages have been sought against any of the subsequent failing contractors, the committee have deemed it a suitable case for the application of a just public clemency, and accordingly recommend a remission of the penalty recovered against the petitioner.

A bill to that effect is herewith reported, and its passage recommended by the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID MYERLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let that go over

JAMES BELL.

The next was the bill (S. No. 125) for the relief of the legal representatives of James Bell, deceased; which the Secretary proceeded to read.

Mr. CLAY. I object to the interest allowed in that case.

The bill was passed over.

JOSÉ DE LA MAYA ARREDONDO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 126) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of José de la Maya Arredondo.

It will be a direction to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to cause to be surveyed twenty thousand acres of land in Florida, according to the calls, boundaries, and description contained in the grant by the Governor of East Florida, to José de la Maya Arredondo, bearing date March 20, 1817, and referred to in the record and proceedings of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the United States against Benjamin Chaires and others, decided at the January term, 1836, and according to the survey of the same grant made by Joshua A. Coffee, in 1824; and, upon the return of the survey to the General Land Office, a patent is to issue to the heirs or legal representatives of Arredondo, for any portion of the land which may, at the time of survey, be found to be vacant; and for the remainder of the grant, they are to have the right to enter, in any land office of the United States, a like quantity of any land subject to private entry, in parcels conformable to sectional divisions and subdivisions.

Mr. STUART. Unless the friends of that bill are disposed to amend it so as to limit the location of the excess to the State of Florida, I shall object to it. If they will locate the excess in Florida, where the original grant was, I have no objection.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That clearly cannot be admitted. This is to correct a location, and the grantees, from equitable considerations, are unwilling to disturb persons who have received titles from the Government, and have improved the land, on condition that they may take land elsewhere at $1 25 per acre.

Mr. STUART. I say "elsewhere in Florida."

Mr. BENJAMIN. No; clearly not elsewhere in Florida.

Mr. STUART. Then I object to the bill.

The bill was laid over.

GEORGE PHELPS.

The bill (S. No. 128) for the relief of George Phelps was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to George Phelps of $1,155, in full for extra services performed by him while acting as messenger in the quartermaster general's office, in December, 1839, to May, 1846.

Mr. HALE. Let the report in that case be read.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, on the 8th of February, from which it appeared that the claim was for night and Sunday work.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Let it lie over.

The bill was laid aside.

JEHU UNDERWOOD.

The bill (S. No. 129) to provide for the final settlement of the land claim of the heirs of Jehu Underwood, in Florida, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claim and title of Jehu Underwood to land in the State of Florida, derived from the Spanish Government, shall be received and adjudicated by the judge of the district court of the northern district of Florida, upon the petition of the claimants, according to the forms, rules, and regulations prescribed to the judge and to the claimants by former acts of Congress in similar claims made and provided, and in the same manner, in every respect it would have been received and adjudicated if the claim had been heretofore presented in the superior court of the Territory of Florida, within the time prescribed by the several acts of Congress for presenting such claims therein for confirmation; and if it be found valid, the district court is to enforce its location upon the same rules and regulations as have been exercised towards other mill grants in Florida.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 14, noes 11; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 15, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. C. C. MEADOR.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHITELEY. I desire to state that, having paired off on Thursday last with the Hon. Mr. DICK, of Pennsylvania, until Tuesday, that gentleman had a perfect right to vote yesterday; and further, that it was impossible for me to be in attendance yesterday. I would also state that had I been here I would have voted in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] for a committee of conference in regard to the bill for the admission of Kansas.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed an act (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence, without amendment; and also, that it had passed an act (H. R. No. 6) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; and also, that it had passed a bill (S. No. 204) to provide for issuing patents in certain cases where grants of the public lands have been or may be made to States by Congress, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

SCIENTIFIC SURVEY OF BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. COMINS, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in reference to the scientific survey of Boston harbor; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now ask for the regular order of business. I hope that, as both Houses have resolved to adjourn at an early day, the committees will be called for reports.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports. Reports are in order from the Committee of Claims.

WILLIAM TURVIN'S HEIRS.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with an amendment, a bill for the relief of the heirs of William Turvin, deceased; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the amendment and report, ordered to be printed.

DINAH MINIS.

Mr. MAYNARD also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Dinah Minis; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

FERDINAND O. MILLER.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Dr. Ferdinand O. Miller; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

On motion of Mr. GOODWIN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Catherine Kincaid, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 239, for the establishment of an inspector's district at the city of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, with a recommendation that it do not pass; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, resolution and petition, and that the same be laid upon the table, and the reports ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for a local board of inspectors at New Albany, Indiana;

A bill providing for an inspector's district at Napoleon, in Arkansas;

A bill for the improvement of the navigation of the falls of the Ohio river; referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals;

A resolution of the House, with regard to the bridge at Rock Island, over the Mississippi river, with report; and

The petition of Messrs. Crawford & Price, and twenty other ship-owners and persons interested in shipping in Cleveland, Ohio, with an adverse report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] who is not now in his seat, has a river and harbor bill ready to report. I hope permission will be granted to him when he comes in to make the report. I will say now, that when that report is made I shall propose a substitute, and move that they be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can entertain no such proposition. If the gentleman from New York comes in and makes a request, it will be propounded to the House.

OFFICERS, ETC., OF REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. MILLSON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time:

A bill regulating the compensation of the officers and marines of the revenue cutters.

Mr. MILLSON. As I intend to ask the House to consider this bill and pass it at once, I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill, which was read, provides, that from the passage of the act the annual compensation of the officers and marines of the revenue cutters of the United States shall be as follows: captains $1,500, first lieutenants $1,200, second lieutenants $1,100, third lieutenants $1,000, engineers $1,100, assistant engineers $1,000; also that the wages of the petty officers, the gunners, and marines, may be regulated and fixed by the President of the United States, so as not to exceed forty dollars per month, exclusive of rations.

Mr. MILLSON. This bill, which has met, I believe, the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Commerce, proposes to accomplish an object which has been sought for some years past, and has been recommended by different Secretaries of the Treasury. The object has been sought to be accomplished before, in connection with a general modification of all the revenue laws of the United States; but the difficulty of inducing Congress deliberately to consider so voluminous a bill as was rendered necessary for the objects contemplated, has up to the present time defeated the consideration of the subject which is now embraced exclusively in the present bill. The committee has, therefore, as an act of justice to a small but very meritorious band of public officers, determined to present this proposition as a separate one, and invite the favorable consideration of the House to it.

I have but a few words to say upon this subject, for it requires but a few words. I believe that the officers of the revenue marine are, perhaps, with the exception of the President of the United States, the only description of public officers whose compensation has not been increased since the period when that pay was last regulated. It is now upwards of twenty years since their present compensation was fixed by law. In that time all the officers of the several departments of the Government—the officers of the Army and Navy, judges and foreign ministers, the clerks in Washington, and those engaged in the employment of the United States—everywhere, have had their compensation increased; but these men have been entirely omitted. A captain of a revenue cutter, performing very responsible duties, and perhaps for twenty or thirty years in the service of the United States, has been and is receiving but the scanty pittance of $1,200 a year. Services involving risks, hardships, and sometimes unusual expense, are compensated by the Government of the United States at the poor sum of $1,200 a year. These men are almost always at sea, exposed to storms and tempests; having to support their families on shore; having to pay their mess-bills in the cutters, and hospital taxes at the same time. The captains of revenue cutters ought to receive a higher rate of compensation than the lowest order of clerks in the Departments of Washington, whose pay now equals theirs, and who labor in comfortable rooms, exempt from danger, and give but a few hours of the day to the service of the Government. The committee have therefore recommended that the pay of these gentlemen shall be raised in a proportion about equal to that in which other classes of public officers have had their compensations increased. The increase proposed is about twenty per cent.; and the whole additional expense to the Government will amount but to a few thousand dollars—perhaps about twenty thousand dollars a year.

The late Secretary of the Treasury recommended this increase of their compensation, and the present Secretary has also submitted a bill for the consideration of Congress, in which he suggests the same rate of pay as that adopted by the committee which reports the bill.

I trust, therefore, as this is a question not involving intricate and complicated details—one which the House can comprehend at a glance, and therefore unnecessary to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and as the only question involved is that of increasing the compensation of these public servants, as the compensation of all others has been increased, that the House will consider it at once, and pass the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the bill, having been engrossed, was read a third time.

Mr. MILLSON moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MILLSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARK ATTICA.

Mr. COMINS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 167) for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine.

Mr. COMINS. It appears by the accompanying papers which I submit to the House, that on the arrival of the bark Attica (a vessel owned in Portland, Maine) at the port of Hamburg, in the latter part of June, 1855, her whole crew became insubordinate, disobedient of orders, and utterly refused to remain in the ship to perform the voyage home. For reasons which I will not detail to the House at this time, and by the advice of the American consul, the master of the Attica was compelled to consent to their discharge. At that time there were no American seamen in Hamburg to be procured. The master of the bark was left to no other resource than to ship a crew of foreigners to take the place of those discharged. On the arrival of the vessel at New York, tonnage duties to the amount of $174 62 were exacted under the act of March 1, 1817. Said duties were paid under protest. The owners of the Attica ask for return of these duties, which, though legally, were unjustly exacted.

In confirmation of the statements which I have made, I submit a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I desire the Clerk to read to the House, after which, I shall move that the bill which I have reported be put upon its passage, and on that motion I shall call for the previous question.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 29, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th instant, inclosing a petition of John W. Chase, on behalf of himself and others, praying a return of the tonnage duty exacted by the collector of the customs at New York from the bark Attica, for a violation of the provisions of the act of March 1, 1817, and in reply to inform you, that the records of this Department show that Captain Chase complained of the exaction of the duty in question, and that, on the 27th of September, 1855, the collector of the customs at New York was instructed, that, as the failure to have on board the proportion of American seamen required by the act of 1817, did not arise from any of the causes specified in the seventh section of said act, the tonnage duty was properly exacted, and that he would so inform Mr. Chase.

Under the circumstances set forth in the petition and accompanying papers, if shown to be correct, the Department can perceive no reason why the relief asked for should not be granted by Congress, who alone have jurisdiction of the matter now. The petition and accompanying papers are herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HOWELL COBB,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. C. C. CLAY, Jr., Chairman of Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if there is a report accompanying that bill?

Mr. COMINS. There are papers accompanying the bill which are substantiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, but no report. It is not usual to make reports in such cases. The facts are as I have stated them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the bill will be read. I presume it is satisfactory.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $174 62, being the amount imposed on said vessel as tonnage duties by the collector of New York, in 1855.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for certain rivers and harbors; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move the reference of that bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed and made the special order for the day, for the first Monday in May next. I may state, in this connection, that the committee has instructed me to report the bill on the system of strict economy required by the present condition of the finances of the Union. Another member of the committee has prepared a bill, and I hope it may also be received and printed.

Mr. CLEMENS. I trust the House will have an opportunity of examining the details of the bill before we are called upon to make it a special order. I object to making it a special order.

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot be made a special order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope, then, that the gentleman from New York will move to suspend the rules on Monday, so as to make it a special order.

The bill was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, presented a substitute for the bill; which was also referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the establishment of a United States consulate at Rosario on the river Panama, in the province of Santa Fé, in the Argentine Confederation, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. HATCH. I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, in relation to an appropriation for Buffalo harbor. I see among the bills which have been read at the Clerk's desk, there is an adverse report in reference to the bill for the improvement of that harbor. I want to know whether that committee has recommended an appropriation for the repair of Buffalo harbor, and to what extent?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The bills, the titles of which have just been read, were not reported upon adversely, but were reported back, with the request that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof. The bill for appropriations for rivers and harbors, which the committee have reported, and which has been ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, contains nearly all the appropriations asked for in the bills just read, though not to the full amount asked.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from New York, I can say that the amount suggested and recommended officially for that purpose, has been inserted in the general bill for river and harbor improvements. The amount, I believe, is some $37,000.

CODIFICATION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the codification of the existing revenue laws of the United States and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I may be indulged in a few words in regard to the bill just reported, and in relation principally to the reference which ought to be made of it and the action to be taken upon it. It is within the recollection of us all that this subject has been before Congress prior to this time, and since the year 1854; that different gentlemen have been engaged upon it at various times, and with various success; that upon a request of the last Congress by a resolution thereof, that a report was made upon the subject by the Secretary of the Treasury to the present Congress, which report was read to the House, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce. That report has been before us, as well as substantially every other communication germane to the subject presented to the consideration of the committee. We found that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was defective in some respects, and those respects having intimate relation to the classification of collection districts throughout the United States and the ports of entry and delivery thereof, as well as to the compensation of officers of the revenue; so radically defective did we find this chapter, that we referred them back to the Secretary, and the force of the Department, under the direction of the committee, are engaged in remodeling that portion of the bill. Of so great importance and consequence is it to the country, that we have decided not to include that portion of the general bill within the bill now reported to the House

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is, "Shall the bill be read a third time?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the bill been read through?

The SPEAKER. It has not. It can be done after the gentleman shall have concluded his remarks, and before the question is put.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will not uselessly occupy the time of the House; and shall not probably consume more than five minutes more.

I was saying that the character of this bill now presented by the committee to the House, is entirely referential to the codification of the revenue laws of the United States, as they at present exist. This codification is based upon the laws of 1793 and 1799. There never has been a question made, either in this House or by our judicial tribunals, that these laws required codification.

It therefore consists simply of a collation of those laws which are applicable to the collection of the revenues of the Union, and of a supply of other laws which are requisite to replace those which, while a part of the system of 1799, have become inapplicable to the extended ramifications of our increased commerce.

I now ask that the bill may be read a third time, and that its consideration be made the special order for the second Wednesday of May next.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot have its third reading at the present time unless the House determine to proceed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I withdraw my motion then, and move that the consideration of the bill be postponed until the second Wednesday of May next.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope no special order will be made.

Mr. SEWARD. As this bill embraces very important matter, I think it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be fully discussed and amended, and therefore I adhere to my motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish to say that the Senate having passed the resolution, in concurrence with the House, to adjourn sine die on the first Monday of June, it becomes necessary that the appropriation bills should be speedily acted upon, and I hope no special orders will be made to interfere with that important part of the public business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia will not prevail, for the reason that this is a matter of legislation which is imperatively demanded by the country. This codification of the revenue laws is, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. COCHRANE] remarked, one which has been before Congress and before the Secretary of the Treasury for six or eight years; and now that the bill has been perfected, I trust that the House will act upon it at this session of Congress. If it is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, we all know it will not be reached, and will not be acted upon. I hope, therefore, the motion of my colleague on the committee—that the consideration of the bill be postponed to the second Wednesday of May next—will be agreed to, and that the bill will then be taken up, and passed.

Mr. LETCHER. Such a postponement will give that bill precedence on that day, will it not?

The SPEAKER. During the morning hour.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I hope the House will not adopt that course. If we are going to adjourn in six weeks we ought to have the appropriation bills considered.

Mr. SEWARD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether this bill is not similar in its provisions to the bill reported last Congress by the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. Fuller)?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is, in the main; but in some respects it differs. I think there will be no objection to this bill upon either side of the House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. In reply, further, to the question put by the gentleman from Georgia, I may state there are many material variations from the bill introduced last Congress by Mr. Fuller, of Maine; that the bill has been subjected to the closest scrutiny of gentlemen in the Treasury Department; and has the approbation, I believe, of the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

And I further remark, for the information of the House, that this is not at all a bill which affects in the least the collection districts of the Union, the ports of entry and delivery, or the compensation of revenue officers. It is simply a codification of existing laws, and nothing more or less.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not desire to be captious upon the subject; and in order to afford an opportunity to the gentleman to take a vote upon it, I will withdraw my motion to refer, and in addition to the pending motion, I move that the bill be printed. I want to look at it.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 83, noes 55.

So the motion to postpone and print was agreed to.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMER FEARLESS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 51) to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, made adverse reports on the following petitions; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed:

The petition of merchants and business men of Chicago, asking for the improvement of the harbor of that city; and

The petition of sundry ship carpenters of St. Louis, asking that the inspectors of hulls, provided for in the steamboat passenger bills, shall be required to be practical shipwrights.

LANDS TO AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES, ETC.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill No. 2, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Mr. COBB. I move that the bill and report be printed. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WALBRIDGE] has a counter report which he wishes to make; and I will yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I desire to make a report from the minority of the Committee on Public Lands. In view of the importance of this question to the country, it being, I think, one of the most important that has come before this House, I move that its consideration be postponed until Wednesday of next week, and that the bill and the reports of the majority and minority of the committee be printed, so that every gentleman may act advisedly upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama surrender the floor?

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] introduced the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inquired of the gentleman from Alabama whether he surrendered the floor, with a view of knowing whether to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. COBB. I surrendered it for the purpose of allowing that motion to be entertained.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to yield me the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield the floor to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a question of order. I object to the gentleman from Alabama holding the floor and enabling the gentleman from Michigan to make a motion to postpone, unless the question is open for a motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or any other motion. I desire that the House shall have an opportunity of determining what they will do with the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the objection would have been properly taken if it had been taken in time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I took it as soon as I understood what the proposition was. There was so much confusion in the Hall that I did not at first understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Well, whenever the question is put, it will, of course, oust the gentleman from Alabama from the floor, and I shall then, if I can get the floor, make the motion to commit.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. Either the gentleman from Alabama has yielded the floor altogether, or the motion of the gentleman from Michigan is not in order. It is impossible that the gentleman can keep the floor and yield it to another gentleman to make a debatable motion, and then intervene and cut off discussion on a debatable proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes the same ruling in response to the gentleman from Kentucky which he made to the gentleman from North Carolina. It could not have been done if any objection had been made. But no objection was made at the time. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan was received by the unanimous consent of the House, given impliedly, at least, if not expressly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I suggest to the Speaker that it was impossible to know what the gentleman's proposition was until he uttered it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated it distinctly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That his intention was to move to postpone?

The SPEAKER. No; that the gentleman had moved to postpone.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As soon as he made the motion, we raised the question of order.

The SPEAKER. Some time has intervened since the motion was made.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We will get a chance after a while to move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw his motion, in order that I may submit some remarks on the bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I object to his yielding it to everybody.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is difficult on this side to hear what is going on between the gentlemen on the other side, and I would inquire what is the question pending?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to print the bill and report of the majority of the committee, and the views of the minority, and to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Wednesday of next week.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. It is understood that I include both the report of the majority and the report of the minority.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair has stated.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. COBB. I have no objection myself to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object, unless the gentleman from Alabama yields the floor unconditionally.

Mr. COBB. I do not object, but I should like to retain the floor for the purpose of reporting other business.

Mr. MORRILL. I claim the floor. I propose to offer an amendment which strikes out all in relation to the Territories.

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well, sir, I will submit some remarks on the subject.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Has the gentleman from Alabama yielded the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama to claim the floor no longer.

Mr. COBB. I did not intend to yield the floor unconditionally, but now I do not object to the gentleman from Vermont going on with his remarks.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont.

MINNESOTA BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. MORRILL. Will I have the floor in the morning?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have the floor when the question again comes up.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will state to the House that I wish to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table in order to take up the Minnesota bill. I demand tellers on the motion to go into committee.

Mr. STANTON. What disposition does the gentleman propose to make of that bill?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I propose to take it up and to put it on its passage.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Vermont having the floor, it cannot be taken from him by a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. According to the practice of the House, the gentleman from Georgia, or any other member, pending the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, can move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GROW. Can the floor be taken from the gentleman from Vermont, in order to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table, and then, instead of going to that business, can go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will remember that such has been the uniform practice for six years.

Mr. GROW. I do not remember, and that is why I put the question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember that the practice has varied in a single instance.

Mr. GROW. The point I make is this: if the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table be voted down, will not the gentleman from Vermont be entitled to the floor? I say that it is not in order to put the question on the motion to go into committee, until the question has been taken on the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House allow the motion to go into committee to be made at any time. They give that motion precedence over all others. When a motion is pending to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, it is in order, before that motion is disposed of, to move to suspend the rules and go into committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. In what condition is the bill from which we are about to pass? Will it go to the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope there will be no objection to the submission of a motion to recommit to keep it before the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be considered that the motion to recommit is pending.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the motion to go into committee be voted down, and the motion I have made prevail, I propose to take up the bill for the admission of Minnesota as a State into the Union. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the gentleman's purpose when the bill is taken up?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is my wish that it should be put on its passage. If the House takes it up, however, it is for the House to do what it pleases. I want it passed. I see no reason why the admission of Minnesota should be any longer delayed.

Mr. GOODE. The House has already adopted a resolution to close the debate on the auxiliary guard bill to-day, and I hope that, instead of going to the business upon the Speaker's table, we will go into committee, and afford an opportunity to the gentlemen who have intimated a desire to be heard on the question. I feel it to be my duty to insist on my motion, although it is unpleasant to me to differ from my friend from Georgia at any time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Caskey, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the call,

Mr. POTTLE stated that Mr. BURROUGHS was detained at his room by illness.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 232, to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. THOMPSON] was entitled to the floor.

AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. THOMPSON. In offering a few suggestions upon the bill now before the committee, I wish to state, in the first place, that I have no objection whatever to giving my support to a proper bill organizing a police force in the city of Washington, to be paid in part by the General Government. The District of Columbia is under the peculiar jurisdiction of Congress; it is the child of Congress. Here are our public buildings; this is the place of meeting of the National Legislature; here is the house of our President; here our public grounds; and we are bound by every consideration to make this a model city, and to establish in it a model government. Persons and property ought to be more secure here than in any city in the United States. Now, sir, I would not be nice upon this question; I would not split hairs in regard to the particular amount of money I would afford to the municipal corporation established for the purpose of aiding them in organizing and maintaining an efficient police.

The propositions in this bill involve two questions. The first is a question of power, and the second is a question of policy. Something has been said by gentlemen in regard to the question of power. It seems to me that very few observations will be sufficient upon that subject. Gentlemen will find, by looking at the eighth article of the Constitution of the United States; that there is a provision in that article granting to Congress the exclusive legislation in all cases whatever over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States. It was anticipated at the time this Constitution was formed that there would be a cession of ten miles square made for the purposes of the Government of the United States. Although the Constitution was made in 1787, and the cession was not made from Maryland and Virginia until 1791, yet there was an anticipation in the Constitution that this cession would be made, and provision was made that Congress should exercise an exclusive jurisdiction over the territory thus to be ceded. The consequence is that the District of Columbia became a Territory, or a quasi Territory. It is not an ordinary Territory, because our Territories are entitled to Delegates upon this floor; it is not a State, because the States are represented here; but it is a quasi Territory, under the control of Congress.

It was suggested by the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill, that the mode of appointing the officers provided for in this bill, is limited by the provision of the Constitution (section two, article two) which requires that the President of the United States shall appoint all officers under the Federal Government. The answer I have to make to that is, in the first place, that these are not Federal officers contemplated in the Constitution of the United States. It does not relate to any officers of the local magistracy. It cannot relate to any such officers, because they are provided for under the ample powers of the provision of the Constitution to which I have already adverted, and because, if that is the construction which should be put upon this clause of the Constitution, then by what right do the people of this city to-day elect their Mayor? The Mayor is just as much an officer of the Federal Government as any officer whose appointment is contemplated in this bill. But from the granting of the first charter of the city of Washington, in 1802, down to this time, the people have exercised the power of voting for the officers of this corporation under the authority of that act of Congress. I need say nothing more upon the question of power. The power is full, ample, unlimited, and sufficient.

Mr. GOODE. I did not hear the gentleman's first reference.

Mr. THOMPSON. There are two clauses of the Constitution which authorize Congress to exercise unlimited power over the District of Columbia in reference to appointments and everything else—the one already mentioned, and that which gives to Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations for Territories. Now, as I have stated, in 1802 Congress gave to the inhabitants of the city of Washington a municipal charter. They reserved the right of eminent domain, and delegated all the functions of local sovereignty to the people of the District. They did it upon the principle that it was not consonant with the genius of American institutions to hold the twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty thousand people who might settle here in a state of perpetual pupillage, in a state of organic pauperism as to political rights and privileges, thus encouraging a total disregard of all personal responsibility, and a habit of looking to the Government for everything. If a contrary policy had been pursued, it would have created a different people from that which exists in any other part of the United States. At first, the President appointed the Mayor; but after a while the people had authority to elect their own Mayor and their own aldermen and inferior officers. And in the tenth section of the act giving a charter to the city of Washington, the power of taxation was limited to seventy-five cents upon the hundred dollars.

Now, sir, we had no complaints for a period of more than fifty years that the system of police organized by the Mayor and Common Council did not work to the protection of the lives and property of the citizens of this District. There was no difficulties suggested on the subject. But after a while, it was supposed, as the city enlarged, that Congress ought to do something; that, having a large interest here, having immense buildings to protect, and extensive grounds that were adorned and beautified, to take care of, Congress ought to do something by way of assisting the city authorities in the maintenance of an adequate police force. The consequence was, that the law which it is now proposed to repeal in part, was enacted, giving an auxiliary guard of some thirty men, paid by Congress, for the purpose of assisting the police of the city.

Now, sir, this was inaugurating a policy, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] says, which was entirely new. It was inaugurating a policy which no State had inaugurated. Neither Massachusetts, nor New York, nor South Carolina, nor any other State in this Confederacy had ever seen fit to organize or maintain a police force in the city where the capital of the State was situated. How has the thing operated? Why, gentlemen have said upon this floor, and I presume it is true, as it has not been controverted, that the system has operated inharmoniously; that these forces have become antagonistic forces; that the force of the city operates in one way, and the force of the Federal Government operates in another way, and that they come in conflict. Gentlemen have said here, without contradiction, that when the officers of one department were in the very act of arresting a criminal, the officers of the other department would stand by and refuse to render assistance. I do not know how this is, but it has been alleged on this floor to be a fact and has not been contradicted. The reason of it is this: you can never have an efficient police force, unless that force emanates from a single power, whatever that power may be; unless it has relation to a single head; unless it has concentration; unless it is organized upon the principle of the spider and his web, so that one head controls, and one will govern, and men are responsible to a power one and indivisible. The directing power must be a unit, simple, single, and undivided. Well, sir, if the two forces now in existence do not operate harmoniously, why would you increase one of these forces? Would they operate any more harmoniously than they now do? In order to have that harmonious operation, you must alter the thing radically in principle, for if you make a vicious system good men cannot make it operate well. The fault, after all, must be in the system more than in the men; and this is my opinion of the matter.

Sir, it is said we must increase this force because life is unsafe, because property is unsafe. Is life more unsafe in this District than in other cities? I know not; but the Mayor of this city states in answer to a certain inquiry propounded to him by a committee of the Senate, that there is a spirit of lawlessness pervading the whole land; that deeds of violence and bloodshed are perpetrated even in villages and hamlets; and that all the cities of the country are suffering to a greater extent than ever before from the prevalence of this spirit in their midst. So that the Mayor of this city repudiates the idea that there is a greater amount of crime existing in this city than in other cities of like extent.

Now the question arises, how are you to produce a better state of things? One gentleman says, by a preventive police. Another gentleman says, by moral force. Now, I beg leave to say to gentlemen who think that the whole security of the body-politic rests in a preventive police, that there is no such thing as a physical preventive police. Your preventive police is in your pulpit, and in your school-houses, and in the prompt administration of law. That is the only preventive police. Why, if you intend to have a preventive police of an amount sufficient to protect all the members of Congress and all the strangers and all the citizens of this place, from injury, you would want a policeman to every single individual; and even then you cannot prevent the deliberate act of the assassin, who chooses to seek out his victim and murder him either in daylight or in the dead of night. Why, on this principle the force proposed by this bill is not half enough. If we are to have a preventive police I would assign the chief, as having the largest salary, to the President to take care of him. I would assign the captain, with his $1,200 a year, to the Secretary of the Interior, because the recent aggression on him shows that perhaps he is in some danger. And then here are four lieutenants—I would assign them to the guardianship of the Senate, as they are high in office and in character. Perhaps they would be sufficient for the protection of the Senate. And then here are the hundred policemen. If this is to be a preventive police we would want two hundred and thirty-four—one for each member of Congress. Each member of Congress, on the principle of this being a protective police, ought to have one to go with him by day and to take care of him by night.

Now I have one suggestion to make in regard to all this. You cannot protect life, and you cannot protect property, through the instrumentality of a mere preventive police. Why, sir, it has been ascertained, I believe, by gentlemen who have studied the annals of criminal jurisprudence pretty accurately, that crime seems to be periodical. It has its peculiar phases. In some countries and ages it takes a peculiar form, such as assassination at one time, poisoning at another, drowning at a third, and so on. Crime has its cycles, and it may have its locations also. I do not say, I would not be uncharitable enough to say, that crime increases at the seat of Government just in proportion as our friends of the Democratic party happen to be in power.

Now, sir, it is suggested that there are three difficulties in the way of the present police acting efficiently for the protection of persons and property. The one difficulty suggested is this: that the members of this police force are incompetent and vicious; the second is, that the criminal court is inefficient; and the third is, that the Mayor is unfit for his position. All these suggestions have been made on this floor. Now, sir, I need not refer to the fact, in proof of this, mentioned yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT], that he met two of these police officers on the sidewalk in a state of intoxication. In regard to the Mayor, I need not advert to the proof furnished by the grand jury, that peaceful citizens in this city, in June last, were shot down by a body of marines, led on under the direction of this Mayor, who was then being voted for as a candidate for the mayoralty. The grand jury found that fact. Now, if that be so—and I simply take up these accusations as I find them—whose fault is it? Whose fault is it that the police force of this city is inefficient, and fails to protect persons and property? I answer, it is the fault of the people of this city, who have the power in their own hands, through their Mayor, of correcting the evil—who have the police force under their direction and supervision.

But suppose you divide this responsibility; suppose you permit part of the force to remain as the force of the city, and another part under the control of Congress: you only increase the evil; and if the citizens of this District should blot out their entire force, and we should organize one hundred or one hundred and fifty men for the protection of persons and property in this city, the citizens—paying nothing, and being under no responsibility—would be under no obligation to see that the Mayor of this city was a man fit for the position to which he aspired.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does the gentleman mean to argue that by increasing the police force you increase the evil?

Mr. THOMPSON. I mean to argue this: that inasmuch as you relieve the people of this District from all responsibility, and take away from them the privilege of controlling mediately their police force, through the Mayor whom they are to elect, and who is to nominate the police force, you lessen their interest in the government of this city.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand the gentleman from New York to take the position, in effect, that the Democratic Administration is responsible, to a great extent, for this disorder.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not said it.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to say that it is very unfair to hold the President and the Administration responsible for disorders here, and at the same time deny to them the power to control a police to put them down.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know that the President has anything to do with it. I have more respect for the President of the United States than to degrade him to the level of a police captain, and to have his proclamation run, "I, James Buchanan, President of the United States, and captain of the police of Washington." I do not want to append a tail of that kind to his title.

Now, sir, I say that the people of this District ought to control the police force of this District. That is the principle on which I stand. If they are not able to control that police force or to pay it, I would afford them the means by a donation from Congress for that purpose. But I would have no divided responsibility; I would not have two organizations; I would have unity, consolidation; and harmonious, not antagonistic, action on the part of the police officers. But the inhabitants who live here, who have their property here, who have their wives, their children, and all their interests here—I would not relieve them from the responsibility of seeing that their city is well governed, and turn it over to a police force under the authority of, and paid by, the General Government.

Now, three various modes have been suggested of appointing this police force, provided the force is to be increased. My colleague from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] does not like the idea of submitting the election of these police officers direct to the people, because he is afraid that rogues would choose rogues to take care of the interests of the city. Well, if the idea that the people are capable of governing themselves is a myth and a fallacy, let us discard it at once. In our towns, the people elect the constables and police officers of the town, as well as justices; and even in the State of New York, we have intrusted the people with the election of judges; and the system has worked well so far. For my part, I would not hesitate, if a system of that kind were proposed, to give to the people the election of their police officers, just as they elect their Mayor and Common Council. Although a man may be vicious himself, he has an interest in the body-politic. He admires virtue and courage and uprightness in the public officer, and he wants the protection of law. The probability is—and such fact has been demonstrated throughout the country—that the people will elect just as good men as would be chosen by other means. Still, I would not be particular on that point. The second, by the President, to which I object. The third, by the nomination of the Mayor and approval of the Aldermen, which I deem the correct mode.

It is said that there are three sources of the increased criminality and vice in the city of Washington. Some gentlemen say that these rowdies who are about the parks, and in other parts of the city, rendering life insecure, have been brought here as applicants for office. Well, I think that thing may be reformed very easily. If gentlemen who are candidates for office, members of Congress or anything else, will not promise twenty men the same office, provided they work for their election, I think there would be very little difficulty on that subject. If twenty men are promised the same office, the nineteen men who do not get it will become exasperated, and will endeavor to get their pay in retribution and vengeance. A preventive police cannot remedy this difficulty—that corrective lies with us. I suppose our side of the House will have but very little difficulty upon that subject, and the majority can reform, in that regard, whenever they please. It is hardly necessary that Congress, or the city of Washington, should be put to the extra expense for the purpose of correcting an evil of that description.

In the second place, reference has been had to the liquor establishments in this place. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] went into an enumeration of the number of liquor establishments there were in this city, and I think he stated that there was one to every fifty inhabitants. Where does the reformation of that evil lie? It lies with the people of this city. Are they to keep open these rum-shops for the purpose of corrupting the people, and then call upon us to organize and pay an additional constabulary for the purpose of preventing the disastrous effects of them? Nothing can be more unjust and unwise. The people can shut those places of pollution and crime, and thus, in a great measure, cut off the evils of rowdism resulting from drunkenness.

In the third place, it is said that the courts are inefficient; that the criminal judge of this city is inefficient and negligent in the discharge of his official duties. I am not acquainted with that judge, and I know nothing about him personally. That is an evil which can be corrected in the proper way. But though you should have one policeman to every member of Congress, and to every citizen of Washington, they could not correct that evil. It does not lie in the power of the police force to correct the evil of an inefficient and lax administration of justice.

I did not intend to say much upon this subject.

I wish now merely to suggest the mode in which I think all the difficulties of the bill of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, can be obviated. I would establish a system something like this: I would have the whole police force of the city of Washington subject to the nomination of the Mayor, with the approval of the board of Aldermen or Common Council; I would have the force a city force, responsible to the Mayor, and removable by him, with the consent of the body with which he acts; I would have a single head; and if the city is able to raise only about twenty-five thousand dollars for the purpose of paying the expenses of that force, I, for one, would agree to vote an additional amount of $50,000 from the public Treasury—double the amount the city should raise—to enable them to maintain an efficient police force for the protection of life and property in this city.

Mr. GOODE. That is substantially the plan now in force in this city.

Mr. THOMPSON. But the difficulty is, as they themselves claim, that those men who are in office are inefficient and vicious, and that the Mayor is not a proper person. I say that the correction of that evil lies not in the police force, but in the people themselves; and if they will not correct it themselves, no increase of the police will be of any substantial benefit.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. But we cannot rely upon the people.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman says we cannot rely upon the people. Has it come to that, that the people of the city of Washington are not capable of self-government, and are to be held in a state of perpetual pupillage to the General Government; that they are to have no self-reliance, no self-respect; that they are to exercise no political privilege like the rest of us? I am unwilling to degrade them to a level so low.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It has been repeatedly remarked that a large portion of the population of the city of Washington is of a floating character, and that is an additional reason why they cannot contribute more largely to the expense of maintaining a police.

Mr. THOMPSON. I obviate that difficulty by appropriating $50,000, double what the city contributes, for the purpose of enabling them to maintain a police force. But you never can have a divided police which will amount to anything. It will be "city mouse" or "country mouse." Why, this police under the General Government will feel that their dignity is much greater than that of the city police, and the system must work inharmoniously and in antagonism. I intend at the proper time to offer an amendment to this bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and embodying what I have shadowed forth in stating my views upon this subject.

Mr. SCALES. I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to have anything to say upon the question now before the committee. It is true, I am a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and concurred in reporting this bill. But, sir, this debate has taken such a range—so many things have been introduced into it—that I feel called upon, as a member of that committee, to give some of the reasons why we chose to recommend this bill to the House. I say I am surprised at the course which this debate has taken. I am more surprised that it has assumed a partisan character. I had hoped that a bill of this sort, in which we all feel an interest, or all ought to feel an interest, would at least be free from anything like party prejudice and party bias. But it seems that no bill can be introduced here, I care not how sacred the object, I care not how pure its aims and the motives in which it originated, I care not how commendable the origin, but the charge is made that it is brought into being for party purposes. Is this a reason why the Administration should be assaulted upon this question? Is this a proper bill to call forth the denunciation of gentlemen on this floor against the Democratic party, or against any party which might be in power? Yet, sir, that is done. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMINS,] the other day, introduced this kind of discussion, by using language in regard to the Administration which—without attempting to lecture him, or endeavoring to instruct him in good manners—it struck me was not proper and courteous. The Administration, he said, had reached such a point of corruption that even an attempt at modesty and purity manifested in it would excite ridicule and contempt.

Now, sir, I am not here to vindicate the character of this Administration. It does not need any vindication at my hands. The shafts of the gentleman from Massachusetts will fall harmless at its feet. I will not undertake to decide how pure or how modest the sentiment uttered by the gentleman was; but, sir, I do undertake to say that if its expression is as deficient in modesty and purity as it is in fact, then, sir, it has little in it to redeem it from the contempt which, he says, awaits the Administration.

Now, sir, what are some of the objections urged against this bill? It was said by the gentleman who was last upon the floor, by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] the other day, and by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] that it is anti-Democratic; that it is trampling upon the rights of the people; that it is subverting popular sovereignty. Trampling upon the rights of the people! In what, sir? What does the bill propose? To impair and infringe any right? Not at all, sir; but to aid the people in preventing bloodshed, violence, and assassination in this city. The inestimable and invaluable right of which we deprive them, is that we will not permit them to cut each other's throats!

But, sir, is it a subversion of popular sovereignty? If it is, then I ask gentlemen who oppose it upon that ground to pass over the bill, and go back to the Constitution which gives Congress exclusive jurisdiction over the District. Yes, sir, the Constitution of the country, for wise and good purposes, gives jurisdiction over this District to Congress. If the Constitution is anti-republican and anti-democratic, then this bill is anti-republican and anti-democratic. If the Constitution is not, then the bill is not either. But, sir, it does not subvert popular sovereignty. Do we propose, I ask again, to take away any right from the people of this District? Not at all. They have had in their hands the government and the regulation of the police of this city; how have they done it? Need I tell gentlemen the state of things which now exists in this city? Is there a man who has been here a day and a night who is ignorant of it? Crime stalks abroad; there is no law, or if there is a law, no power to execute the law. Our own sense of personal insecurity and danger proves that there is a necessity for some action on the part of Congress. The people will not do it; they have the power, and yet nothing has been done. Is this state of things to continue and to be permitted by Congress? Are we to fold our arms and say that, because we will not subvert popular sovereignty, the people may go on and cut each other's throats—not, as the gentleman from Tennessee said the other day, "subject to the Constitution," because the Constitution gives us the power to prevent it, if we dare to exercise that power.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] says that we have as much right to interfere in any other city where the General Government has a navy-yard or any other property. Can that be so, sir? The Constitution gives us jurisdiction over this city, but over no other city; and here we have exclusive jurisdiction. Sir, it is not only our right, but it is our bounden duty. We have all of us constituents who are interested in this city and in its government. It is theirs. They have a right to come here, and whilst here to be secure in their persons and property. We have the same right. The foreign ministers have a right to be protected. Strangers from foreign lands have a right to be protected. Shall it be said here, in the capital of a great nation like America, here, under the very eye of Congress, and when we have the power in our hands to prevent it, that we are to sit by and allow this state of things to remain as a burning shame and lasting disgrace upon our escutcheon? Where is there a city in any foreign land that is in the condition in which the city of Washington now is?

This bill provides that the appointing power shall be in the President of the United States. Gentlemen say that it will be used for partisan purposes, and that the President is a party man and will appoint some party favorite, without reference to his qualifications, to be chief of police. Mr. Chairman, the same argument was used when the command of the Army and the appointment of foreign ministers were given to the President of the United States under the Constitution. Yet, sir, they were given to him. And when the Constitution gives him such power as that, we hesitate to give him—what? The appointment of a chief of police for sixty thousand inhabitants!

Is it not right that he should have it? He alone is responsible. The responsibility is undivided, and if he is influenced by personal or party considerations, I ask you to point out any other mode of appointment that will be freer from those objections. If you will give it to a board subject to election the responsibility will be divided; they will have the same attachments; they will be influenced by the same personal considerations and the same political biases and prejudices. If you adopt the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODD] and constitute the board of two Americans and two Democrats, or two Black Republicans and two Democrats, you will have as bad a system as you have now, if not worse; because, occupying different political positions, having different friends to reward and different views to carry out, the members of that board will be always antagonistic, and will never be able to do anything to promote the public good.

Mr. THOMPSON. That principle has been tried for some ten years in the State of New York in the election of our county assistant justices, and it has worked harmoniously. The difficulties the gentleman supposes have not happened there. So also in reference to the inspectors of elections. I do not approve of that plan in this matter, but I must say that the difficulties have not occurred to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman does not approve of it, it was useless for him to interrupt me to suggest a plan which he did not approve. These are difficulties which must suggest themselves to everybody, and if they have not occurred in a particular case, then that is the exception and not the general rule.

But the gentleman from New York says that you cannot accomplish anything by a preventive police. Why not? Is it not notorious that there are bands of armed men, murderers, robbers and assassins, who are congregated here from every portion of the Union? We can see them at almost every corner of the streets committing outrages upon inoffensive and peaceable citizens. Now let it be known that there is a police force scattered through the city with an efficient head, and those bands will be broken up and driven from the midst of this community.

The only prevention, he says, is in the school-house, the pulpit, and the administration of the laws. I acknowledge, sir, that any permanent prevention of crime, any permanent promotion of good order, must have its foundation on the principles which the pulpit is intended to promulgate, and in the education of the people. I admit all that; but have we time now to consider it, when the assassin's knife is already raised to give the fatal stab, when murderers are at large, and the blood of innocent victims cries out for justice, and when we are admonished from every side to discharge the duty which is imposed upon us? Is this the time to talk about schools and pulpits? No man honors them more than I do, no man attributes more to them than I do as promoters of good order, but this is not the time for such considerations. We must legislate for the present; we must do something now.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the argument, that the President is not the proper appointing power; suppose that he is disposed to use his power to promote party interests; suppose that, forgetful of his reputation, of his responsibility and of his high station, he should seek party ends alone; is there no guard provided in the bill? The Senate has the power to confirm or reject appointments. If the President be corrupt, is it probable that the Senate will be corrupt too? Here, mark you, we place the power of appointing the chief of police where the appointing power is placed by the Constitution, and the appointment is made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Is it probable that the Senate would confirm any man who should be appointed by the President without regard to his qualifications for the place?

If, however, the chief of police be appointed as indicated by the gentleman from New York, then the conflict of which I have just spoken will arise.

We must have a man placed at the head of the police who is peculiarly qualified and who gives evidence of his efficiency; and for this reason I am for leaving the power of appointment where it is. It impairs no right and deprives nobody of any privilege. It is doing what Congress has a right to do. It is doing what should be done in this city to prevent further violence and bloodshed. I understand, too, that the auxiliary guard which has been already provided by the Government for this city, is now, as the gentleman from New York would have it, under the control of the Mayor, and what is the state of things which is presented to us? Is not the police utterly worthless, totally inefficient?

I will say, in conclusion, that I am not so wedded to this bill that I think it is incapable of improvement. Gentlemen admit the necessity for some measure of the kind—that some such bill should pass; and I am willing to cooperate with them in passing such fair measure as may be agreed upon which will secure the object we all seem to desire.

There is one thing I had almost forgotten, and which I will notice before I sit down, and that is the argument of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I will confess that I was surprised when I heard it. I was surprised to hear him characterize this bill as a money-spending scheme, and allege that it was gotten up by lobby members. I know that my friend from Texas, whom I do not see now in his seat, did not reflect when he made that statement; for I know that he is not in the habit of saying here what is not intended for the House, but for home consumption, for the ears of the people. He says that it is a reckless expenditure. Even so, which I deny, is it not better to be lavish in the expenditure of the public money than reckless of the lives of our citizens? If we have the power, it is our duty to restrain crime and stay the hand of violence and bloodshed in this Federal metropolis.

I say again that I am sorry that party has been introduced into this question. It ought to have nothing to do with it. I look at it through no party spectacles; I view it in no party light; I look only at the interests of the city, the interest of Congress, and the interest of all concerned; I look to our public property, to our public buildings, to our public grounds, to the members of Congress, to the strangers who come here, to our constituents who resort here, to foreign ministers whom we are bound to protect, to foreigners from every land; I look to the keeping up the reputation that this is a land of law and order, as well as an asylum for the oppressed.

Mr. KELLY. The proposition now before the committee is this, that the police laws of this city are of such a character that the citizens of this city have to ask Congress to alter them in such a way as to protect them from the murderer and the assassin. The bill, as reported by the gentleman from Virginia, proposes to give to the President of the United States the power to appoint the chief of police; and that that chief of police, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, shall have the power to appoint his subordinate officers. What is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER? It is, that three commissioners of police shall be appointed, and that they shall have the power of appointing the subordinate officers and men. He proposes that those three commissioners shall receive each a salary of $2,000. That is, in my opinion, an expenditure wholly uncalled for. My experience in the city of New York has taught me that where you put the power into the hands of commissioners to appoint policemen, they set about to see how they can bring about their own reelection. Therefore that provision is, in my opinion, seriously objectionable. It is the great fault here that people have to contend with; and I understand that they are willing now to throw up their charter, given them by the Congress of the United States, for the reason, as they say, that they are not able to protect themselves against the criminals who infest the city.

The amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD,] providing for the selection of commissioners by the people, is, also, in my opinion, objectionable for the same reason. It will work in both ways. Men elected as Americans, will, of course, appoint Americans to office; and vice versa, Democrats will do the same thing. The only way to give this city an efficient police is by passing the bill reported by the gentleman from Virginia. He places the power in the hands of the President of the United States to appoint the chief of police, and gives that chief of police power to appoint his subordinates, subject to the control of the Secretary of the Interior. The increased expenditure is not, in my opinion, material. Congress already pays $19,000 for an auxiliary guard; and the bill of the gentleman from Virginia proposes to increase that to $100,000, and for that you will have such a force as that no future complaints will be made.

Mr. Chairman, in the various arguments that have been made on this bill, all kinds of logic have been brought to bear in favor of gentlemen's different prejudices. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] in discussing this bill yesterday, referred to a transaction which took place during a former Congress. He spoke of men who earn their living by the sweat of their brow, as "a parcel of Irish waiters." Now, sir, I do not think that that expression was called for. These men, whether Irish, or German, or belonging to any other country, have the same rights under the Constitution as American-born citizens. It is not to be said that, because these men were waiters, they had not their independent rights and privileges, as much as the Representatives of the people on this floor.

Some other gentleman, in referring to the trial which took place on that occasion, spoke of the character of the judiciary of this city; and the gentleman from Tennessee took them to task for insinuating that the judiciary of this city was not the beau ideal of a judiciary. But I am not going to prolong my remarks on that subject; but I tell the gentleman from Tennessee, and other members of this House, that the humble Irishman has his rights under the Constitution—naturalized as he is by your laws—equally with the native-born; and until he commits some act in derogation of the true principles of manhood, it does not become any gentleman to stigmatize him or speak of him in such a contemptuous style.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman whether he calls in question any fact which I stated; and if he does, what fact, and in what way does he question it?

Mr. KELLY. No, sir; I question no fact. I was merely commenting upon the gentleman's expression as to "a parcel of Irish waiters." That is all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio; [Mr. STANTON,] in speaking on the subject of this bill, attributed the defeat of that great and honored statesman, who has long since gone to his grave, (Mr. Clay,) to the manner in which the Empire Club of the city of New York was organized, and to the manner in which that election was conducted in that city. Let me tell the gentleman that I was conversant with all those facts, and knew every transaction which took place in New York in 1844. There was another club there upon that occasion, and it was a very objectionable one, because all the pugilists, all the fighters, and all the rowdies you could find, were brought together, by pay, by solicitations of whatever nature, and were formed into a club in opposition to the Empire Club at that time. Now, I ask the gentleman if he knows the man who had the honor of being the president of that club?

Mr. STANTON. I know nothing in regard to that club, but I will inquire of the gentleman from New York whether the captain of that opposition club was rewarded with an office?

Mr. KELLY. I will say to the gentleman that he was frequently rewarded with an office, but I am sorry to say that he got into a personal difficulty in New York, and was killed.

Mr. STANTON. Who was he?

Mr. KELLY. Bill Poole.

Mr. STANTON. What Administration gave him office?

Mr. KELLY. He held the office of collector of taxes, in the city of New York, for years. He held the office of city inspector during Fillmore's administration. He also held the office of lamp-lighter in the ninth ward.

Mr. STANTON. I am obliged to the gentleman for bringing such strong evidence of the demoralizing tendency of politics when they are mixed up with clubs and frauds.

Mr. KELLY. Let me say to the gentleman that when both of those clubs were organized at that particular time, though there were violent men in both, neither one of those clubs used violent means against citizens coming to the polls; and I defy the gentleman from New York or any other gentleman to show a case where a citizen in the city of New York was attacked by them when going to the polls to exercise the right of suffrage guaranteed to him by his country. That cannot be said here, for I am reminded of the transactions which took place in this city last June.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] said, in his speech, that there was no violence in this city; that he had traveled around on frequent occasions, in order to see if some one of these rowdies would not attack him. Now, I know that gentleman has displayed courage upon the battle-field, and rendered essential service to his country. No man doubts his integrity, his honesty, and his bravery; but had he been here last June, he would have met in the streets of this city that which no man desires to meet. I saw a body of young men from eighteen to twenty years of age, driving men of thirty and forty years of age before them like sheep from the field, and firing their pistols among them indiscriminately; yet there did not appear to be, so far as I could see, courage enough in the citizens of this city to resent the outrage which was perpetrated upon them at that time.

Crime, Mr. Chairman, in all cities, whether it be here, or in New York, or elsewhere, unless checked by the physical power of man, will continually manifest itself. Some gentlemen here have argued that you cannot check it by physical force; that moral force must be resorted to. That is all humbug, for such a check amounts to nothing at all. Violence of all description will be committed unless you have proper officers to prevent it. Then, in this case, you ought to organize a police force to meet this exigency, and to arrest the individuals who are in the habit of committing crimes in your city.

Now, this bill organizes an efficient police, under the jurisdiction of officers of this Government, who have the full control of it—a force which will be the means of protecting individuals who come here to transact business, as well as yourselves—for many of you admit that it is dangerous for you to leave your rooms at night, that you are afraid of encountering these marauders who infest the city. The force proposed by the gentleman from New York is objectionable for the reasons I have given. It appears to me that our Republican friends upon the other side of the House are very partial to commissioners, if we may judge them by the acts they have committed in the State of New York. We had an efficient police in the city of New York, under the supervision of the chief magistrate of that city. The Republicans in the Legislature were told that it was not efficient; and for the purpose of bettering it, and in order—to use the language of gentlemen upon the other side, and the language of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON]—to give patronage to their party, they made a police for us. And what has been the consequence? Since those commissioners have held office in the city of New York, I have not learned that a single individual of opposite politics has been appointed upon the police. The main objection upon the other side of the House, in my opinion, arises from the fact that they suppose the chief of police who may be appointed by the President of the United States will be partial in his appointments, and will appoint only partisans, or those who favor his political principles, as it is supposed the President will appoint a man who is of his politics. That argument, in my opinion, cannot hold good. I do not think it will be carried out; and I know if I had anything to do with it I would not be partial at all. I would select men for their characters alone. If I saw they were efficient, physically able to do the duties of policemen, and of good moral characters, I would appoint them upon such grounds alone, without regard to politics. But gentlemen say they are afraid to trust the President. Well, we are afraid to trust them in the city of New York.

Mr. LEITER. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELLY] to say that the Republicans in his State passed a law forcing that regulation upon the city. I want to know whether his own party has not refused to repeal the law—they having the power to do it.

Mr. KELLY. No, sir, they have not the power to do it. Your party still have the power in the Legislature. We have endeavored to repeal the law but you have prevented it by your majority in the Legislature.

Mr. EUSTIS. I have no desire to embarrass the gentleman from New York, but I would like to ask him how he reconciles himself to the idea of taking away from the Mayor of Washington the power of appointing the police, and at the same time complains that that power was taken away from the Mayor of the city of New York? I should like to understand the rule of logic upon which he bases his opinion.

Mr. KELLY. In the case of the city of New York it was entirely a different matter. There were no petitions sent to the Legislature asking them to pass such a law as they passed. They passed it in defiance of many petitions, and of the action of the Common Council of the city, who memorialized them against it. And when a committee of the Common Council went to Albany, to protest against it, they were told by Mr. Littlejohn, the chairman of the Committee on Cities and Villages, "why, there is no use of your coming here to memorialize the Legislature; you have a large party and large patronage; our party is weak in the city of New York, though strong in the interior; we desire to build up a party there, and the only way in which we can do it—for our principles are weak with the people—is to pass a police law, and get the control of the appointment of the police under it."

But, as I understand it, the Mayor of this city has stated explicitly that he, and others who reside here, are willing to give up the charter. He acknowledges that they have not power enough to protect the interests of the citizens, and is willing to throw up the charter. He is willing that the President shall appoint the chief of police. Upon the other hand, the Mayor and Common Council of New York protested against the law passed by the Legislature; and forty-two thousand voters of New York protested against it, to but sixteen thousand Republican votes cast; yet, in the face of all that, the Legislature passed a law as detrimental and injurious to the interests of the city of New York as that law is. I would ask my colleagues, then, who make use of this argument about patronage, to look to our own State first.

Mr. EUSTIS. The House will judge for itself whether the question which I put to the gentleman from New York has been answered. The reason that induced me to ask that question was, that I did not desire to take up the time of the House in any lengthy remarks upon this subject, but simply wished to explain my position in regard to it. While I am willing to vote for any increase of the police force which may be necessary for the safety of the citizens and the protection of the public property, I am not willing to destroy the principle which I regard as one of the great principles of this Government, of the right of the people of the city to manage their own affairs in their own way. I do not understand—and the gentleman from New York has not explained it satisfactorily to me, nor do I think he has to the House—why it is that we here, assembled in this Congress, are attempting to deprive the people of the city of Washington of this right. It is a matter of no consequence to me whether the Mayor of the city is willing that it shall be done or not. I do not think that the private wishes and desires of the Mayor of the city can weigh for one moment in the consideration of this question. Whether he is willing to give up this authority or not, I do not know, and I must say that I care not. The people of this city either have the power to govern themselves, or they have not. If they have, they ought to do it. If they have elected persons to office who do not carry out their mandates, let them select others who will do so. I say that it is a gross insult to the intelligence of the people of Washington to say that they cannot elect a Mayor in whose hands you can place the appointment of a few police officers.

As for the President of the United States, I think that it is an insult to him and to his office to make him a mere chief of police. The President has more to do now than he can attend to satisfactorily to himself—I will not add or to the country, because his term of office has not yet expired. At all events, I am satisfied that he himself does not desire this.

Mr. KELLY. The case of this city and that of New York are not parallel cases at all. This city is under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; the President and Congress of the United States are here; the ministers from foreign Governments are here; and the courts here are under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The only difference between the appointment of the police by the President, and their appointment by the Mayor, is this: the one is responsible to the Federal Government, and if he does not carry out the law, can easily be reached; while, upon the other hand, if the Mayor does not make these appointments satisfactorily, the people cannot reach him in the same manner.

I believe, sir, that the bill reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia is the best bill which has been presented to the House; and I hope it will pass. That is all I have to say.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to give the city of Washington, in the first place, $75,000, which will ere long swell into a half million.

Sir, I am against this bill.

I cannot vote for it, and I will briefly tell you why.

I have heard on this floor several valid objections urged against the passage of this bill, and particularly from the honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] which, in my opinion, are conclusive.

I have another reason which is alone sufficient to carry me against it.

It is, that it is wrong to take from the Treasury the money that belongs to the whole country and give it to the city of Washington to pay for the expense of their police, a police that they are as much under obligation to furnish, as is any other town or city in the Union, if not more so.

A rich and flourishing city of some sixty thousand inhabitants, if they cannot or will not provide a suitable police to protect the persons and property of themselves and all others who come and spend their money here, then, sir, it is high time we adjourn to some other place that will.

What right or claim have they, the people of Washington, to this money?

Is it because the Government of the country is administered here, and by so doing a stream of wealth is continually pouring into the city, the like of which is not done in any other city in the Union? or is it because we have heretofore and are now spending untold millions to improve the city, to grade and pave and light its streets, and even to furnish its inhabitants with water at a cost of millions? yes, sir, literally at a cost of millions.

All this has been done and is doing.

And now it is modestly proposed that we shell out $75,000 to start with, under the head of police arrangements.

It is said we, the members, are in danger, and need protection against outside violence, and that we are to have a patrol guard of one hundred picked men, controlled by a chief of lofty plume, in whose veins runs not a drop of plebeian blood, or it would have been "let out" long ago.

I guess if we behave, and keep the peace ourselves, nobody will hurt us. And besides, if we are really afraid, we had better hold back a company of the Utah regulars.

That would be a gain all round.

And as they are not wanted where they are going, it would be a saving anyhow.

First, it would save the poor fellows from marching their toe-nails off, on a wild-goose chase two thousand miles, to Utah.

Then, their pay would be only eight dollars a month and the captain forty, instead of fifty dollars a month and the captain $200, which the bill proposes to pay.

And here, too, they could subsist on the twenty cent ration, and there on flour at seventy-five to one hundred dollars the barrel.

Sir, if the habit of giving away the money of our constituents to the city of Washington is so firmly settled as to become a second nature, and the disease of so long standing and chronic that it cannot be cured, then I suppose we must fork over.

Sir, it will not be done with my consent.

My constituents shall never have occasion to ask me on my return home, how came you to do it? Sir, I cannot and will not vote for this bill.

And I protest that this House has no right to give away the money of my constituents without their consent.

Sir, I admonish you again that your Treasury is empty; that you have no money to give away or trifle with, and that you need all your money to pay your debts.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few practical suggestions on the bill before the committee, and will begin where the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELLY,] who just taken his seat, began. He told us that the police laws of this city were of such a character that the people asked Congress to protect them. Now, sir, is that a fact? If this be so, I ask the gentleman why the city Council do not make better police laws? They make the police laws, and it is their duty to make them as perfect as possible. This bill you propose to pass is not a police law. It is simply a law providing for a police force to execute such laws as the city government may make. That is all. The making of the police laws for this city belongs to the city government, and not to Congress. In the view taken by the gentleman from New York, it is simply a question of money after all. It is money to support a police they want, and not police laws. They can provide the men, if men are wanted, and they have the means to pay them. All we have to do is to pass a law to establish a police force, and to raise the money to pay a hundred men to execute the laws already made, if pay we must. That is all it amounts to.

Now, it seems to me that the remedy is in the hands of the citizens themselves. By the passage of this bill you do not make any better laws. Not at all. But gentlemen may say there will be more promptness in the execution of the laws. This I very much doubt, and will attempt to show why.

I have serious objections to this Senate bill, and those objections are the very reasons which gentlemen offer in its favor. This is a Federal measure. You make a national police—a thing heretofore unheard of in this country. You make the great political head of the nation the head of the police of a small city. That is what you propose to do by this bill. The chief of police is to be appointed by the President of the United States, subject to removal by him at any time, and, of course, he will be under his control. He appoints the Secretary of the Interior, and you make the Secretary of the Interior appoint the captain, the lieutenants, and the one hundred men, all subject to his control. He can discharge them at any moment. You will have, then, a police in this city entirely separated from the people. You do not stop with placing the entire police force under the control of the Executive; but the very regulations which are to control the police are to be made by Federal officers. You do not allow the city government to have the least interest in the matter. The regulations which are to govern the police are to be made by appointees of the President. Now, I say, that that is an entirely new feature in this Government. You have got nothing like it in the present auxiliary guard, because the city has some control over that; but you propose to make this force entirely distinct from the city.

Why, sir, I thought it was a recognized and settled principle in this country that we had a national Government, State governments, and municipal governments, each having their recognized and distinct spheres of action, and which ought to be kept distinct from each other as far as possible. But here you are making the political head of the nation the head of the police. You are destroying that harmony, that congruity that has heretofore existed in all these separate governments of the country. You are destroying the great principle of American government by placing this national police, this pretorian guard, under the control of the executive will, over the people of a city. Sir, was it ever intended by the framers of the Constitution, in giving Congress the control of the legislation of this District, that Congress was to control all the municipal regulations and officers of cities, to appoint and control all the officers of the cities in the District, and to make this great national Government the executors of municipal law? No, sir, I do not believe any such thing; I do not believe that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to make the President of the United States a police officer, or to place the municipal government of this District under the control of the executive department.

The intention was that Congress should make general laws for the District, but not municipal laws and regulations, and require Federal officers to execute them. The formation and execution of municipal laws in this country have, by what has grown into the common law of the land, been everywhere left to the people of the municipalities. Cities and towns in this Republic are peculiarly the children of the people, the schools of democracy, and the real democratic institutions of the country. Here is where the people first learn self-government; they vote away their own money; they decide how and where they shall make their roads; how ornament them; and how much money they shall spend on them. They take care of their poor; and wherever they are wise enough to have public schools, they vote the money for their support. And above all, they regulate their own safety and good order, their morality and their security. The security of life and property is in the hands of the people, and if they do not feel the responsibility resting upon them for their own security and good order, who will? The speedy establishment of order and security, Mr. Chairman, is, it appears to me, the duty of the people of this city; and I, for one, have no idea of giving my vote to relieve them of that imperative duty, and thereby decide that they are totally incapable of governing themselves.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, in all the highly colored accounts of dangers to life in this city that have been given here. No doubt there is insecurity, much disorder, and many desperate acts committed; I cannot believe that there is quite so much danger as gentlemen appear desirous of having us believe. I have wandered about the city unarmed in nearly all directions, for exercise and health, and have never been molested; nor have I known a feeling of fear in my rambles; and I intend to go where and when I please, until I see more cause of danger than I am now aware of.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you are attempting to establish two police forces; and this fact, of itself, is, in my judgment, an insuperable objection to this bill. You are establishing a force outside of the city, and not in harmony with its people. You have another police force inside and under the control of the city. Now, if the people of this city are so poor that they cannot take care of themselves, let us appropriate money for a police, but let the police be under their own control. You are creating two opposing, antagonistic forces to keep up a rivalry with each other. How is it now? You have been told here that when one of either force is making an arrest, an officer of the other force may be standing within ten feet of him, and will not aid in the slightest degree. They belong to different departments. One is a degree above the other. One belongs to the great national political power of the country, the other to a mere municipal corporation, elected by and responsible, as it should be, to the people. Let them be a unit if you would have efficiency. Place the duty of supporting and governing this police force upon the people, as you should do, instead of keeping them in leading strings and in a state of pupillage. As long as you continue this policy, they will lean upon the Government for everything, and shirk all the duties they can.

As to the money, I am rather indifferent, although I do not feel disposed to vote away money from other sections of the country to sustain a police among a people who are as well able to maintain that police as my own constituents are. But gentlemen tell us this is a floating population. Let us look at that. Here are men coming to this city to take the best offices of the country, and holding them generally for four years, and a large number for an indefinite term of years. They have to pay taxes for the support of their police at home; why should they be relieved from doing the same here? If you have carried the taxing point up to the full limit allowed by the charter, amend the charter. Give them the same unrestrained power to tax themselves that other people in other sections of the country have.

While living is not much higher here, labor is higher than in other sections of the country. All these men have fair salaries; and certainly, if they would each drop a cigar or a glass of liquor a day they could sustain a police. I am not willing in effect to raise their salaries by making other and distant people pay their taxes for them. It is not for the want of means that they do not support an efficient and faithful police. But, Mr. Chairman, if you show me that we have not done enough for the city, I am willing to do more. I am willing to vote to sustain a police for them, if you will show me that they are really unable to sustain one themselves; for a police they must have. But it does appear to me that if we have got to make appropriations for this city, they should be made for other objects than for the support of a police. You may pave their streets for them if you will, supply them with pure water at an expense of millions, and ornament the city with beautiful architecture, statuary, and paintings; but do not let us undertake the execution of police laws, and deprive the citizens of Washington of their municipal rights. Let them exercise the rights of American citizens, and try to govern themselves.

Now, I am willing here to say that I have not that entire confidence in the political head of this country which would lead me to place this power unhesitatingly in his hands. We see that all over this country, in every section of it, this spoils doctrine prevails. Why, talking about the city of New York, do we not recollect, but a short time ago, when the citizens of that city, without distinction of party, united to reform the city government, and nominated a Democratic Mayor against the caucus nominee, that because a distinguished Federal officer in that city took part on the side of the people in favor of reform, and against the caucus nominee, he gave offense at the White House, and was removed from his office? Now, a President who will thus interfere with the municipal affairs of the city of New York, will not be very likely to conduct the municipal affairs of this city without partiality.

So it is everywhere, Mr. Chairman. This spoils doctrine has gone into the navy-yards, and the best workmen—American-born citizens—are made victims of that universal law of proscription. Wherever the Executive arm can reach, there you find that principle of proscription prevailing to a most relentless and tyrannical extent. Secretary Stanton, the acting Governor of Kansas, was made its victim and removed for a strictly legal act—calling the Territorial Legislature together as a peace measure. He was performing his duty under the law, and I contend the President had no right to interfere with or control him. Now, while this is to be the case, I prefer to trust the people at any time, rather than to put this police force and the government of this people in the hands of the President. I have no desire to aid in bringing here a foreign pretorian guard or gens d'armes to harass and lord it over this people. I prefer to trust the people themselves, rather than such rulers.

I want to notice one thing more—the remark which was made the other day by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] in speaking of a man who was indicted for a crime, and was appointed to office. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, he asked if it “Was a crime to be indicted by a Black Republican?” That was all the reply the gentleman had to make to a charge of such a grave character. He distrusts the honesty of a large majority of the people of this country; and comes gravely before this House, and says that whatever charges may be made by these people are entirely unworthy of the people's confidence. I will not quarrel with him about the justice or good taste of such remarks. If he is satisfied with the exhibition he made of himself, I certainly am. Then he proceeded to talk about Governor Robinson, and made certain statements which I shall here take the liberty to notice, for it was not, as I understand it, a fair representation of the case as it occurred in California, although the gentleman no doubt thought so.

The facts are simply these. A multitude of people went upon lands near the city of Sacramento under the same right that all people have who squat, as it is termed, on our public lands. A war was got up to drive them off. A large number of them were gamblers and speculators, and had not the slightest claim to the land occupied by the settlers. They wished, without claim, to take it for their own use. Governor Robinson had no interest in any of this land. He was called upon to aid in securing the rights of the settlers; and believing their cause just, he responded to the call. He took sides, as he always has, with the people against their oppressors; and with his aid the rights of the people were recovered. It is true he was indicted, but he was elected to the Legislature, served out his term, and was never tried. The truth is, his cause was just, and he was sustained by the people. The gentleman said that the next thing you hear of him he is in Kansas making mischief there. Who was making mischief when his house was burned down, his library and furniture destroyed by invaders, robbers, and incendiaries; when there was no one to protect his property but his wife; and when it was done without any provocation on his part. Who were the mischief-makers when this same man was confined for months, guarded by armed ruffians, on false, or rather no charges at all, and could not persuade or drive his enemies to bring him to trial? He was kept imprisoned that his head and hands might not work for the freedom of Kansas. Were the gentleman to be told of all the doings of that man in Kansas he would find that his page of personal history is as pure and unsullied as that of the gentleman from Virginia himself, or any other assailant.

I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] that much of the cause of the low state of morals here and elsewhere, is owing to this extreme partisan action; and in thinking of it I have sometimes thought it would be far better for the country to pass some law, if we could make its operation equal, that men should hold their offices during good behavior, instead of at the will and pleasure of a partisan chief, that the country might be relieved from this terrible and increasing evil. It had better be so, though it might have the appearance, perhaps, of being somewhat anti-Democratic, than to be running down and down as we have been, and now are, into the very dregs of political corruption.

But there are other causes of this state of things. Besides the free use of ardent spirits in this city and elsewhere, I have thought there is another cause quite as powerful, and which has as much influence over the peculiar character of the crimes to which it gave rise—that is the universal practice of wearing arms, a practice growing out of the dueling code. It may be traced to that at first. Men wear arms, they say, for their own safety. It tends to lessen the value of life in public estimation. It has now got into the hands of these rowdies, so that it is now getting to be quite ungentle for a gentleman to murder a man. I have some hope, however, that this fearful state of things will produce a reaction at last.

What must be the remedy for all this? I am not capable of giving advice upon that point, but I can only say if every man who feels his own personal responsibility in connection with this matter will set the right example in himself, and abstain from wearing fire-arms, and from all kinds of violence and vice, it would react upon the community; for it is the every-day acts of you and me and of every gentleman upon this floor, and elsewhere, however inconsiderable they may appear, and however small and minute they may be, that enter into the great whole, and make up the account of every day's transactions. They go into the history of the country and reflect back upon the people. The people take their examples from the highest sources; and when we reform ourselves in these particulars, and, with all who hold influential positions in society and pretend to desire reform, will hold up a continued and unexceptional example to the country, I warrant you that reform will extend to every department of Government and of society.

Mr. LEITER. When the gentleman from Virginia introduced his bill, I thought I discovered in this House some disposition to have some action in regard to the matters of this District; but after listening to the discussion that has been going on from day to day, I confess I doubt very much whether this House will be able to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion upon the subject. The views of gentlemen appear to be as diversified as their views upon every other subject. One has a distrust of one kind, and another has a distrust of a different kind; one finds one fault, and another finds another fault. All propositions have met with opposition here. Under these circumstances, we can hardly expect that anything will be done for the good order of the people of this city. I then introduced my substitute for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia. I did so because it appeared to me then that objection would be taken to that bill on the ground that it would inaugurate an immense political machinery by which the rights of the people of this city would be subverted. I must confess, sir, that I have my doubts of any good results following the adoption of that bill. It is a fact, standing upon every page of the history of your District, and almost upon every page of the history of your country, that politics and political organizations control, not only in this District, but in the country, all the municipal elections over the whole extent of our country.

In view of this historical fact, what can we expect from a law which places the appointing power in the hands of the Chief Executive—the very man who stands at the head of one of the political organizations of the country? The system which he will be called upon to put in force will be a political machine that will be used for the purpose of advancing the interests of the party in power. My purpose in offering my substitute, was to obviate that objection, which, in my judgment, is a paramount one. This city is the great resort of politicians. It is the place where every scheme of the schemers and politicians is concocted and sent out to the country. For one, I could find no fault with the President if he should take ground with his political party. As party men, we have party feelings, and always feel disposed to reward our political friends for services rendered, or supposed to be rendered in political campaigns. The President, having had a large number of people of this kind doing valuable service for him, if not for the country, has all those men hanging about him for the purpose of getting places, and some of them seeking places under this very law. Why, sir, to-day the streets of Washington are filled with gentlemen marching about asking members of Congress and others to sign papers recommending them for chief of police, or captain of police, or for a lieutenantancy. When all this political influence is brought to bear upon the Executive, I tell you he would be more than human if he could withstand it.

In the substitute which I offered for the purpose of obviating this difficulty, I named three commissioners. I proposed to name the commissioners in order to keep the matter out of the hands of the Executive, and to prevent, if possible, any party machinery from becoming attached to the system. But I find among all the plans and schemes that have been brought forward, that there will probably be no chance for my bill at all, and I do not know that there is anything particular in it to commend it to the favorable consideration of the House.

The proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DOB,] to elect a board of commissioners, is, in my judgment, as objectionable as the plan of the committee. How will you prevent these men from conducting the elections here in just such a manner as they have been conducted by them heretofore? Will not party machinery be brought to play? Why, surely; and the moment party machinery is applied to the system, that very moment it becomes corrupt.

I take it that it is conceded on all sides that we have constitutional power to legislate for this District. I believe no gentleman has doubted that proposition, or if he has, he has not expressed it. If, then, we have the power, I say it is our duty to act, and to act promptly and efficiently, and, as far as we can, provide for the punishment of these men who are violating every law upon the statute-book, and committing murder in the broad day-light in the presence of members of this House, as has been said.

But, sir, we have a duty to discharge, beyond merely providing a police or auxiliary guard for this city. We are advised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that there are three hundred grogeries in this city—mere nurseries for crime and licentiousness. So long as those nurseries are permitted to be kept up, you may expect to have crime piled upon crime. No good government can exist in such a place. We are further informed by the gentleman from Mississippi of the important fact that the city government receives a reward—a price—for licensing the keepers of these dens of iniquity. Sir, we can have no good government here, and no good laws, while these places are permitted to be kept open; and I call the attention of the Committee for the District of Columbia to the developments which have been made in this discussion. If it is right to sell intoxicating liquor, let it be sold as calico is sold, without a license. If it is wrong to keep open these grogeries, close them up; but do not grant them licenses, so that, by authority of law, they can go on and build up a system of crime, organized as it is in this city, so that men may violate the laws of the country with impunity.

Much has been said here in regard to the Mayor of this city. I have no controversy with the Mayor. By what has been said upon this floor, and by what we see every day upon the avenue, gentlemen can judge of the efficiency or inefficiency of that gentleman and his administration.

But, sir, it is apparent to every one that one great cause of all this trouble grows out of the fact that you have, in this city, a club or political association, called "Regulators" or "States' Hose," or some such name. There is also an association—I do not know whether it is political or not—called "Swypers;" and nine tenths of the troubles that we have had here have grown out of the difficulties between these two organizations, which in any well-regulated city would long since have been disbanded. I say that if the city government had discharged its duty, as it should have done; if it had been faithful to its trust, it would have long since disbanded these ruffian organizations, and driven them from the city. But instead of this, I am told that American citizens have been removed from the navy-yard here, for the purpose of making room for these very border-ruffians; that men who were born in the District of Columbia, and have reared up families in it, have been discharged, and their places supplied by outcasts, the scoundrels of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, who have been brought here to regulate the city. From such regulation God save my community!

It is currently reported and generally believed that there are men employed in some of the Executive Departments, as clerks, who belong to these regulators of the city's morality; men who receive $1,600 per annum and upwards; and these are the men who are to give tone to public sentiment, and who are to be the supervisors, by peculiar fitness, of the public morals. These are the very men; they who leave their offices at an early hour, and spend the rest of the day and night in grog-shops with the rabble who are committing these depredations we hear of upon the innocent and unoffending. Several weeks ago I saw, on Pennsylvania avenue, a man in the possession of a police officer, and a ruffian start up and plunge his bowie-knife into him; this, too, sir, at two o'clock in the afternoon. These things are of daily occurrence, and no punishment has been inflicted. I believe on yesterday there was a conviction. It will be extraordinary news for the country, that in Washington a man has actually been convicted of a crime which he committed. It promises something; we are led to believe that some good may come out of this political Sodom.

Mr. Chairman, it is our duty, as Representatives of the people of the United States, to act promptly and efficiently in regard to this matter—to do our whole duty, for upon our action depends the honor and integrity of the American people. If we sit idly by when crimes of the darkest dye are committed, what record will it leave against us? I am therefore in favor of speedy action, but not political, partisan action. Give me a plan for securing peace to this community, some plan that will drive from its midst the ruffians that infest it, and I will vote for it. In view of what has taken place here and elsewhere in political organizations, I can never consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] I want full action, searching and effective action; but so long as we strike at the consequences, and do nothing more, these troubles will never end. I want to do more. Let this committee for the District of Columbia give the House an efficient bill—one that will close up every grogery, stop the entire system of granting licenses; that will extinguish these corner grogeries, very appropriately

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 102.

called Democratic nurseries by the celebrated Mike Walsh—and I will go with you.

Mr. HUGHES. It strikes me that my friend has changed front on this question; and I should like to know whether, since the introduction of the question, there has been a conference on the subject among his political friends?

Mr. LEITER. Not a word.

Mr. HUGHES. I will ask him further, whether he was not brought up within the Democratic party?

Mr. LEITER. Yes, sir, I was brought up in the Democratic party, when there was such a thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I want to enter my protest against my friend from Indiana joining with the Republicans to make this a party measure. I have been read out of the party once, and do not care to run the risk again.

Mr. LEITER. The gentlemen seem to have got into a side issue, and I will leave that for them to settle.

I want to answer the interrogatory of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES.] I have been a Democrat ever since I have been a voter. I have voted that ticket all my life. I vote that ticket now as Democracy was understood when it was in its prime. I served in the ranks for years, and I have held political position by Democratic votes. I have been president of a Democratic State convention, of Ohio, and I have been elected to the lower branch of the State Legislature by Democratic votes.

Mr. HILL. I would ask the gentleman whether he does not construe Democracy as General Jackson construed the Constitution—as he understands it? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEITER. Certainly; and considering that I was brought up in the party, my understanding of it must be pretty accurate.

Mr. HUGHES. Have the Democratic nurseries to which the gentleman refers been established since he left the party, or were they nurseries of the party when he was in full fellowship?

Mr. LEITER. I never heard of them as such until within a year. When I was a Democrat, Democracy grew naturally, and there was no necessity for such hot-house appliances as gro-shops. Now, sir, by this new process an old-line Whig or Know Nothing can be changed in a miraculously short time, to an ultra Democrat much better and more reliable than those that have always been Democrats. It makes an excellent quality of Democrats—a kind of hot-bed Democrats. [Laughter.] They did not use to grow that way in my time. [Laughter.] [To Mr. HUGHES. Anything further, sir?]

Mr. HUGHES. Well, inasmuch as the gentleman invites me to put him another question, I want to ask him this serious one.

[Cries of "Oh, no; don't get serious."]

Mr. HUGHES. I want to know if the gentleman stands before the House here in opposition to his own amendment?

Mr. LEITER. No, sir. I said I did not; but I said that in view of the enormity of the crimes which we have heard of on this floor, I mistrust even my own amendment, if it should be adopted, as being of any value to the people. I shall vote for it; but I think there will be something necessary after this bill is passed.

A MEMBER. No mental reservation now.

Mr. LEITER. No, sir; I have no mental reservation on anything. We are a bold people in Ohio. We are used to say what we think. At least that is the way we used to do before we got to growing parties in hot-bed nurseries.

Now, I will show clearly to my friend from Indiana that the proposition introduced by the Committee for the District of Columbia will not answer the purpose; and I propose to read from a speech made by a gentleman who is high authority in this House, and who has voted with the gentleman from Indiana on every question of a political character since the meeting of this Congress, and who, I have no doubt, will vote with him to the close. According to that speech, there were in this city, so early as 1844, political organizations which sent out circulars to different parts of the country, in order that they might get up a very nice, strong, and wholesome spawn of Democrats. And, further, that even the President of the United States sanctioned all these things, and removed men from office for not obeying the mandates of these committees. I refer to the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] delivered in 1844, to show the effect of these Democratic nurseries. The speech will be found in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe of 1844-45, page 117.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman permit me to read an extract as to the raising of money by his party in the canvass of 1856, to buy rifles?

Mr. LEITER. Oh, I will answer that if the gentleman will let me alone. I would have got to it in the natural way. I am posted up upon your proceedings in 1856. These things, I say, have been done in this city, and always will be done.

Mr. HUGHES. Here is an article headed "Peace-makers for Kansas," which I wish to read.

Mr. LEITER. What are you reading from? Mr. HUGHES. It is copied from the daily Cincinnati Gazette, a Republican paper, of February 18, 1856, and is as follows:

"PEACE-MAKERS FOR KANSAS.—General Pomeroy addressed the citizens of Worcester, Massachusetts, on the 10th instant, in behalf of the freedom of Kansas, and in the course of his remarks observed, that on the Saturday previous he had been able to send to General Robinson $1,500, and on the previous Saturday $2,950, all of which had been generously contributed at a few meetings which he had been invited to address. At the close of the address the president called upon Eli Thayer, Esq., which is reported by the Spy as follows: 'He said he was a peace man, and his offer to furnish a thousand superior rifles was based upon an earnest and sincere desire to prevent the shedding of blood. A large number of men were engaged in their manufacture in the city, and a portion of them would be completed in the coming week, but as it was desirable that some additional arms should be sent to the Territory at once, he proposed to pay for ten Sharps' rifles at twenty-five dollars each, on condition that during the coming week other citizens of Worcester would subscribe enough to make up the number to one hundred rifles. Several gentlemen subscribed for a rifle, and sent their names to the Chair, and before the audience left the hall twenty-three rifles, equivalent to the sum of five hundred and seventy-five dollars, were subscribed for. Mr. Thayer's generous proposal was received with great applause, and a committee of three was appointed to solicit subscriptions for the requisite number. Of course, they will find no difficulty in securing the material aid necessary.'"

Now, I have one question to put to the gentleman from Ohio. He has told the committee that he was the Speaker of a Democratic House of Representatives in Ohio. I want the gentleman not only to tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, but I want him to tell the whole truth. I want the gentleman to tell the committee what happened to his hat while he was in the chair. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. LEITER. Nothing more than has happened to the hat of the gentleman. [Renewed laughter.] Is he answered?

Mr. HUGHES. No, sir.

Mr. LEITER. I do not carry bricks in my hat. [Laughter.] I do not see what all this article read by the gentleman has to do with this question. If it has any application to it, it only goes to prove just what I said, that this matter ought not to go into the hands of politicians; but why he read it at this time, I cannot conceive; for, if it proves anything, it proves this, that the people of the Territory of Kansas had not arms for self-defense, and that they were attacked and assailed by these border ruffians, and needed these rifles for self-defense.

Now, I can show something with regard to this Empire Club of New York. I refer again to the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina. If he takes it back, I will not read it, nor will I hold him responsible for it, unless he is willing to stand by it. It is this:

"The great State of New York claims the first notice. During the past year, there were naturalized there not less than seven thousand foreigners. This was effected entirely by the Democratic party, the Whigs having no office provided for that purpose, because, as I learn, there is not one of these foreigners out of fifty who will vote the Whig ticket. Of this large number, a great proportion, not having been five years in the country, could not be legally naturalized, and their votes, therefore, when given, were illegal.

"Men who had not been one month in the country, from the penitentiaries of Europe, unacquainted even with the language in which they were sworn, voted for what they knew not.

"But the principal frauds were practiced by what is called double voting. The city of New York was the great theater where this was consummated. As the Empire Club bore such a prominent part in these transactions, I must devote a remark or two to it. It was organized in July last, and it consisted of gamblers, pickpockets, droppers, burners, thimble riggers, and the like, and its association seems to have been then mainly for the purpose of carrying on successful these and similar trades. Most of its members had been repeatedly indicted for crimes. Its general character, however, may be sufficiently inferred from that of some of its officers. Its president was Isaiah Rynders, often arrested for thimble-rigging and similar offenses. He and Joseph Jewell, being indicted for murder, fled from New York to New Orleans. By the by, I may here mention that this Jewell, who has indictments for murder in two different cases hanging up against him, was the standard bearer of the club, and figured as the standard bearer of the Texas banner in the processions. These worthies had not been long in New Orleans before they found it convenient to leave, being charged with stealing Treasury notes. They came to this city, and were arrested and sent back in irons by order of Captain Tyler. I mention this circumstance to show the imitations of the times; for since the election, this man Rynders, having become a great man among the Democracy, has not only dined with Benjamin F. Butler, when the electoral vote was given to Mr. Polk at Albany; not only has he received a complimentary ball from the chairman of the Democratic general committee of the city of New York, but, having come on with his friend Jewell to this place for an office, as I am told, if the papers are to be relied on, he has been cordially received at the White House. Whether President Tyler or president Rynders then remembered the ironing, is not, however, chronicled. But I am digressing. John J. Austin, vice president of the club, has likewise pending against him an indictment for murder, and was likewise implicated in the charge of stealing Treasury notes. Woolridge, his secretary, but recently came out of the penitentiary. William Ford, one of its directors, in the short interval of time which elapsed between the publication of a notice of one of its processions and the arrival of the day of parade, was indicted by the grand jury in seven cases, rape and burglary being among the offenses. Being put in the Tombs, he unfortunately lost the opportunity of figuring on that occasion. Soon after tried and convicted of the first-named crime, he was sent to the penitentiary, but, his services being valuable to the party, he was immediately pardoned and turned out by his Democratic Excellency, Governor Bouck. I may remark, too, that this official dignitary, a short time before the election, restored to their political rights all the criminals in the State, and pardoned a great number who were in the penitentiary."

Isaiah Rynders, referred to in this speech, is the same man that was appointed by the President as marshal of the southern district of New York, and now holds that responsible position.

Now, sir, when official functionaries do such acts as these, I ask how can we trust any mere politician in the discharge of so important a duty as the appointment of the chief of police of this city—a chief who is to have all the police regulations under his jurisdiction? It is already reported that the man who committed the first offense in the riots in June last is to be the chief of police. Why is he to be the chief of police? Because he is one of the thimble-riggers of the party, and has rendered good service to his party. Then we are to trust these men. That would only be to add one hundred thieves to those already existing here.

Mr. FLORENCE. What is the man's name?

Mr. LEITER. I do not know.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman must be in confidential relations with the President, and the President must have informed him of the fact.

Mr. LEITER. I am not a favorite of the President, as is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I am glad of it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Perhaps, as my friend from Alabama says, the gentleman may have confidential relations with that class of fellows.

Mr. LEITER. Not at all. However, that is a pretty smart retort of the gentleman.

Mr. FLORENCE. I thought it, and therefore I said it.

Mr. LEITER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seldom says anything but what is smart—in his opinion.

In view of all the circumstances of this case, I think it eminently proper that we, as judicious and discreet men, desiring to do right, and to protect the people of this District from these crimes and offenses which have been heaped up mountain-high before us, should do something, do it quickly, and do it well, in order to restore good order and good government to the people of this city.

It is claimed by some that the people of the District of Columbia have the right of popular sovereignty, that great panacea for all the evils of the people, which was preached upon every stump in 1856, before the election of the President, and repudiated now by every Democrat in this House except twenty-two. That popular sovereignty, which was preached all over the length and breadth of the land, from Maine to California, and from the Pacific to the Lakes, before Buchanan was elected, and repudiated here, is now to be claimed for this District. The right of sovereignty of this District is in the United States, and can only be exercised by the representatives of the people, and not by the people of the District. Why try to make anything more out of this popular sovereignty idea? It is dead and gone. You have gained the only victory you will ever gain on any such ground as that. It was a bad investment.

Now, sir, inasmuch as my proposition is not up, and wishing to be distinctly understood, I say I shall vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia as it now stands; but, if he will put it into such a shape that I can vote for it, I will go as far as I can, consistently with my convictions of right, in order to give peace and quiet to the people of this District.

I am glad that this discussion has taken place, that the people may know what kind of society, and what kind of municipal regulations we have in this city; for, if the Representatives should go home, and tell what crimes are committed here, their constituents would think they had become insane in the capital of the nation. Yet, when all testify to it upon the floor of this House, no man can doubt the truth of what has been said; and I fear half the truth has not been told, and never will be. Hoping something will be done that will result beneficially to the people of the District, I leave this matter with the committee for its action, without anything further from me.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being Senate bill "To establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject;" and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. KELSEY, (at twenty minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. T. M. CARSON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a copy of the proceedings of a board of officers appointed to examine and test the improvement of the fire-arms invented and patented by Captain J. N. Ward, of the Army; which was, on motion of Mr. CLAY, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the publication of the results of the naval exploring and surveying expedition to the North Pacific ocean and China seas, and also of the results of the expedition to the La Plata river; which was, on motion of Mr. STUART, referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILL DAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This day having been appropriated by special resolution to the consideration of private bills, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of those bills, unless they be postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to make a report. I hope I shall be allowed to do so.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to present several memorials and joint resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to present memorials or reports, unless on leave granted by the Senate, this whole day having been set apart for private bills by a special resolution.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to suspend the special order until one o'clock, so that the morning business may go on.

Mr. STUART. I submit that it would be better simply to postpone the private bills by general consent, until the Senate gets through with the morning business.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will understand that to be the sense of the Senate unless objected to, and will therefore receive petitions, reports, and resolutions.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARLAN presented a memorial and resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in relation to the grant of land for the improvement of the Des Moines river; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of a repeal of the duty on sugar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial and resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in relation to the five per cent. school fund; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in favor of an appropriation of money for a double track railroad around the lower rapids of the Mississippi, on the Iowa or west side of the river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in favor of certain additional mail facilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in relation to the pension of Catharine Dickerson; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the memorial of George Stealey, of Frankfort, Kentucky, praying for compensation for services and expenses while on a mission to the Indian tribes in the northern part of California, under authority of the Indian commissioners, in 1850 and 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of a grant of lands to that State for the erection of buildings for an agricultural college; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON presented the petition of Verlinna S. Hutchinson, widow of C. C. Hutchinson, a private in Captain Nelson's company of Georgia mounted volunteers in the Mexican war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HUNTER presented the memorial of the President and Directors of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, praying that the United States, by an appropriation or advance of the dividends resulting from their stock in that company, or otherwise, will aid in the construction of the new cut from the south end of the canal to the Pasquotank river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. J. F. CARTER, their Chief Clerk, was received, announcing that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (No. 51) to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless.

A bill (No. 167) for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine.

Also, that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 482) regulating the compensation of the officers and marines of the revenue cutters, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JONES, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Roddy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CRIMINAL COURT IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the criminal court for the District of Columbia, and of establishing a municipal or city court in the city of Washington.

LANDS IN IOWA.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate the number of acres of vacant lands in the even-numbered sections which remain to the United States in township eighty-nine, range forty-seven, in the State of Iowa, and also the reasons why the vacant even-numbered sections in said township are not included in the proclamation for public sales to commence at Sioux City, Iowa, on the 1st day of July, 1858.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BRODERICK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 269) for the better security of landowners in the city and county of San Francisco, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of George W. Flood, reported a bill (S. No. 266) for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of G. A. Breast, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 267) for the relief of G. Alonzo Breast. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 174) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Aaron Haight Palmer, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 268) for the relief of Aaron H. Palmer. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 181) for the relief of Anson Dart, reported it with amendments.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. The Committee on Finance have directed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, with some amendments. I give notice that, to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill. I shall not ask to have it taken up to-day, because a response has not been received to the call made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] for information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the report made by the Senator from Virginia passes from the Senate, I should like to inquire what the amendments reported are? If they are important ones, I trust they will be printed. I know that, at former sessions of Congress, the appropriation bills have come in, and numerous amendments have been reported without there being any opportunity to see them or know what they were. I trust the amendments, if they are of any importance whatever, will be printed, that we may see them before they come up for consideration.

Mr. HUNTER. There are only two small amendments, and the bill will be printed as amended, under the rule, without any order; but I am willing that an order shall be made for the printing, if necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is to be printed, it is all I ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the proposed amendments, will be printed under the rules, as a matter of course.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to take up the bill (S. No. 197) providing for the arrest and return of fugitives from justice to the District of Columbia. There is a necessity for its present consideration. It is perhaps known to most Senators that within two or three days past an outrage was committed in this vicinity. Some five persons engaged in that outrage have been arrested and brought to the District. Some three others are in Baltimore, and there is no way of bringing them here to be tried with the others. I am told that there is no provision now for returning fugitives from justice to this District. I wish the bill to be acted on at once, so that it may go to the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill. Under the provisions of the bill, if any person charged with treason, felony, or other crime, in the District of Columbia, has fled or escaped, or shall flee or escape from the District, the judge of the criminal court may appoint an agent or agents to demand of the executive authority of any State or Territory such fugitive, who shall be delivered up, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the United States for the delivery of fugitives from justice, to be removed to the District of Columbia. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. HALE. I ask the consent of the Senate to offer the following resolution; to which I hope there will be no objection:

Resolved, That the select committee on the Military Asylum be authorized to employ a clerk for the remainder of the session, if necessary.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like the Senator to state if it is absolutely necessary to have a clerk for this special committee?

Mr. HALE. It is. That is the unanimous opinion of the committee. We have had one meeting.

Mr. BIGGS. It occurs to me that it is incurring an unusual expense. I prefer that it should lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) The Chair understood there was no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will hear me a single moment, I will state that the committee have had one meeting, laid out their programme, and are unanimously of opinion that a clerk is required; and, if we have one, we hope to get through this session.

Mr. BIGGS. I will not object to the consideration of the resolution; but I shall vote against it.

The resolution was adopted; there being, on a division—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CARTER, their Chief Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed enrolled bill (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate take up the Calendar where we left off yesterday afternoon, and proceed with cases that shall not be objected to, or lead to debate, so that the docket can be gone through with in that way. Doubtless there are many bills that can be passed without debate and without objection, and it is important that they should go to the House of Representatives as soon as possible. After we go through the Calendar in that way, we can go back and consider the other bills.

Mr. STUART. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. IVERSON. I trust there will be no objection.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

JENNETT H. M'CALL.

The first private bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war.

Mr. CLAY. I object to the consideration of that bill at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SAMUEL V. NILES.

The bill (S. No. 131) for the relief of Samuel V. Niles was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Samuel V. Niles of $360 for services as a temporary clerk in the General Land Office in the years 1849 and 1850.

Mr. CLAY. I will merely ask the Senator who reported the bill whether it has been before the Court of Claims? Do I understand that it comes from that Court?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir, I think not. This man was employed, and there was some misunderstanding about the amount of his per diem; but the person who employed him, the former Commissioner, stated this was according to the contract, and was necessary to make up the proper price.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD D. REYNOLDS.

The bill (S. No. 132) for the relief of Edward D. Reynolds, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the allowance to Edward D. Reynolds of two and a half per cent. upon the amount of military contributions received by him while acting as purser to the United States ships Warren and Southampton, on the coast of Mexico, during the Mexican war; but the allowance is not to exceed $614 63, which is to be in full compensation for all extra services, expenses, and losses, during the period he acted as purser of those ships, according to the spirit of the act of March 3, 1849, "to provide for the settlement of accounts of public officers and others, who may have received moneys arising from military contributions or otherwise in Mexico."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING.

Mr. BAYARD. Yesterday, when the Private Calendar was up, there were several bills antecedent to this upon the Calendar which were passed over under the assurance that they should come up to-day. There is one that I have an interest in seeing passed, believing it to be a meritorious case. I do not see why we should not go back to the commencement of the Calendar. Several bills were passed over yesterday under that assurance, and I do not think they should be postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the assent of the Senate, an order was made directing the Calendar to be taken up where it was left off yesterday.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill (S. No. 30) for the relief of Elizabeth Montgomery has been up twice before; it was read through, considered as in Committee of the Whole, the report was read, and the bill was postponed at the time only in consequence of the morning hour having elapsed.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator that it is understood we shall go on with the Calendar, passing only such bills as are not objected to, and then return and begin again. We shall soon get back again.

J. E. MARTIN.

The bill (S. No. 134) for the relief of the legal representatives of J. E. Martin was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will be a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of J. E. Martin, late acting consul of the United States at Lisbon, for diplomatic services rendered by him as chargé d'affaires at that place, from the recall of Mr. Clay, on the 19th of July, 1850, to the arrival of Mr. Haddock, his successor, on the 15th of June, 1851, a period of ten months and twenty-seven days, $2,042 12, being one half of the salary of a chargé d'affaires, and in full for all such service for the period named.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. Y. HANSELL AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 135) for the relief of W. Y. Hansell, W. H. Underwood, and the representatives of Samuel Rockwell, which proposes to pay them $30,000 for professional services as attorneys and counselors to the Cherokee nation of Indians.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let that bill go over for the present.

GEORGE W. LIPPITT.

The bill (S. No. 140) for the relief of George W. Lippitt, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow to G. W. Lippitt, United States consul at Vienna, the sum of $1,075 10, for compensation for taking charge of the archives of the United States legation at Vienna, and performing diplomatic services from October 13 to December 10, 1852, and from May 21 to September 13, 1853, embracing, in the aggregate, a period of five months and twenty-one days, being one half of the salary of a chargé d'affaires for that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH STROOP.

The bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Hannah Stroop, widow of John Stroop, deceased, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow her a pension of four dollars per month, as widow of John Stroop, a soldier of the revolutionary war, from April 11, 1853, to continue during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES G. RIDGELY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 144) for the relief of Captain Charles G. Ridgely, of the United States Navy.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let that bill lie over.

JAMES SUDDARDS.

The next was the bill (S. No. 148) for the relief of James Suddards.

It provides for the payment to James Suddards, passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, of the sum of $413 14, being the difference of compensation to an assistant surgeon and a passed assistant surgeon, from May 17, 1854, to March 9, 1856.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that bill.

GEORGE H. HOWELL.

The next was the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of George H. Howell.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That involves the same principle.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to it.

LIEUTENANT JOSHUA D. TODD.

The next was the bill (S. No. 153) for the relief of Lieutenant Joshua D. Todd, United States Navy.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is the same principle. Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that. I object to all this back pay.

WILLIAM F. CARRINGTON.

The next was the bill (S. No. 154) for the relief of William F. Carrington, passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that bill. I object to all back compensation.

ROBERT CARTER.

The next bill (S. No. 155) was the bill for the relief of Robert Carter, passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that. It is of the same class.

JOSHUA SHAW.

The next was the bill (S. No. 156) for the relief of Joshua Shaw, of Bordentown, New Jersey, which proposes to pay him $7,000 for the use of his invention of percussion caps and locks for small arms, and of percussion locks and wafer primers for cannon.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that bill. I think there has been a large compensation made in that case.

ANTHONY S. ROBINSON.

The next was the bill (S. No. 158) for the relief of Anthony S. Robinson, heir and legal representative of John Hamilton Robinson, deceased.

It proposes to pay for services rendered by John Hamilton Robinson to the Republic of Mexico, the sum of $16,956, which is to be taken out of the residue of the three and one quarter millions of dollars mentioned in the fifteenth article of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded at Gaudalope Hidalgo the 2d day of February, 1848.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that bill.

MRS. ELIZA A. MERCHANT.

The bill (S. No. 163) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza A. Merchant, widow of the late First Lieutenant and Brevet Captain Charles G. Merchant, of the United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will be a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Eliza A. Merchant on the pension list at the rate of fifteen dollars per month, to commence September 4, 1856, and continue during her life.

Mr. TOOMBS. Read the report in that case.

The Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. FOSTER, on the 23d of February last:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Eliza A. Merchant, widow of Brevet Captain Charles G. Merchant, praying Congress to grant her a pension, beg leave to report:

That petitioner, on behalf of herself and child, claims a pension for the reason that her husband, the late First Lieutenant and Brevet Captain Charles G. Merchant, died in the military service of the United States, at Pascagoula, Mississippi, on the 4th of September, 1855. Petitioner alleges that her husband, Lieutenant Merchant, graduated at the United States Military Academy at West Point on the 30th day of June, 1843, and was promoted to brevet second lieutenant in the eighth regiment United States infantry, July 1, 1843; that he served during the war with the Mexican Republic, and was breveted first lieutenant September 8, 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Molino del Rey, and brevet captain September 13, 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Chapultepec; and, on his return from Mexico, he was ordered to Texas, and, in an affair with Indians, May 20, 1850, was severely wounded, from which he never fully recovered; in April, 1855, he was ordered to East Pascagoula, Mississippi. The testimony of J. J. B. Wright, surgeon United States Army, and John F. Randolph, who was acting assistant surgeon United States Army, both strongly corroborate the statement of petitioner that the wound alluded to was the cause of his death. The Commissioner of Pensions, in a letter to this committee, dated January 2, 1857, says: "If the committee are of opinion, from the medical testimony, that his death was hastened by the wound, the claim of the widow to a pension would seem to be as meritorious as some others which have been allowed by special act." It is also disclosed by the Commissioner of Pensions that Charles G. Merchant was a first lieutenant at the time of his death. The committee, after a careful examination of the testimony, are of opinion that the death of Lieutenant Charles G. Merchant was hastened by a wound received in a battle with Indians, May 20, 1850, and the application of Mrs. Eliza A. Merchant, his widow, is worthy the favorable consideration of Congress, and report the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. M'CRABB.

The bill (S. No. 164) to provide for the settlement of the accounts of the late Captain John W. McCrabb was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of the late Captain John W. McCrabb, assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, to allow and credit his charges for the disbursement of special appropriations during the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, and the first quarter of 1839, to the amount of $5,293 96; and to pay the balance which (after the allowance) shall be found due, if any, to Mrs. Jane M. McCrabb, his widow.

In his account, rendered to the Department shortly before his death, which occurred in November, 1839, Captain McCrabb charged for the disbursement of $215,259 67, at two and a half per cent., amounting to $5,381 10, accompanied with the following statement: "Though I have charged a percentage on my disbursements out of the appropriations for suppressing and preventing Indian hostilities, from a deep conviction that it is a just and equitable claim, and should be allowed, as a just recompense for the extraordinary and unusual risks and responsibilities I had to encounter in making the said disbursements, I have retained no portion thereof." The charge was disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury; and the object of the petition of Mrs. McCrabb is, that Congress may allow the claim, and authorize a credit to be given to her late husband, or to her, as administratrix, on the books of the Treasury Department.

It appears from a letter from the quartermaster general's department, to Hon. Richard Brodhead, chairman of the Senate Committee on Claims during the last Congress, dated January 16, 1855, that the whole amount of moneys disbursed by Captain McCrabb, in Alabama and Florida, during the years 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839, out of the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida, was $234,299 85; of which was disbursed, during the third and fourth quarters of 1839, $22,541 40. The act approved March 3, 1839, prohibited the receipt by any officers having a salary of any extra allowance or compensation for disbursing public money, or the performance of any other service, unless the extra allowance or compensation was authorized by law. This act prohibits the allowance of any extra charge to Captain McCrabb upon the sum of $22,541 40 disbursed after its enactment. The remainder of his disbursements was made in 1836, 1837, 1838, and the first quarter of 1839, and amounted to $211,758 45. Upon this sum, in the opinion of the committee, Captain McCrabb is justly and equitably entitled to a commission of two and a half per cent. It is clear that the disbursing of the special appropriation was no part of his official duty as assistant quartermaster, and was imposed upon him, as appears by the letter of General Jesup, of December 15, 1853, by the sudden and pressing emergency of the public service, growing out of the Creek and Seminole wars, and the contracted force in the quartermaster's department. The disbursements were made under circumstances which subjected Captain McCrabb to great anxiety and risk of loss, and he could hardly have disbursed so large a sum, under the difficult circumstances by which he was surrounded, without considerable loss. Under this state of facts, the committee think he is justly entitled to extra compensation. If he had not disbursed these sums, the Government would have been compelled to employ a special agent for that purpose, at an expense not less than the amount claimed by Captain McCrabb.

The question of the equitable liability of the Government, under such circumstances, to pay extra compensation, has been repeatedly adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States, and in every case that court has allowed such extra compensation to be plead by way of a set-off against the Government, in a suit against the officer. (See McDaniel's case, 7 Peters, 1; Ripley's case, 7 Peters, 18; and Fillebrown's, 7 Peters, 28.)

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELEAZER WILLIAMS.

The bill (S. No. 166) for the relief of Eleazer Williams, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow to Eleazer Williams $4,000, in full for his claim arising under the ninth article of the treaty with the Six Nations of New York Indians, January 15, 1838.

In this case the memorialist claims pay for services rendered by him to the United States, in procuring lands from the Menomonee and Winnebago Indians, in the then Territory of Wisconsin, for the use of the New York and St. Regis tribes. These services were rendered at various times from 1819 to 1832, and resulted in the treaties of 1827, 1831, and 1832, between the United States and the tribes. The history of embassies sent by the New York Indians to the Green Bay country, in Wisconsin, and of the negotiations at Butte des Mort, in 1827, and of those leading to the treaties with the Menomonees and Winnebagoes in 1831-32, extending from 1829 to the ratification of the treaty of October, 1832, with the Menomonees, contains evidence of the connection of Mr. Williams with the interests and transactions of the New York tribes. He was reputed to be a half-breed of the St. Regis tribe, and was sent by them, and recognized as their agent, and as such signed various articles, treaties, and memorials. In a letter to the Hon. John H. Eaton, then Secretary of War, dated December 5, 1830, General Cass, in recommending Mr. Williams as a sub-agent at Fox river, says: "He rendered essential service to the United States during the late war, in which he was actively engaged and badly wounded, the effect of which will probably continue during life. I understand that he enjoyed the confidence of one of our highest and most distinguished officers, and bravely led a heavy column in the battle of Plattsburg. He is a gentleman of education and talents, and from his position and associations can render important services to the Government and the Indians."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OTWAY H. BERRYMAN.

The bill (S. No. 171) for the relief of Otway H. Berryman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to allow to O. H. Berryman the sum of $2,160 03, being the amount of losses sustained by him while commanding and acting as purser of the United States schooner On-ka-hy-o, with a proviso that this sum shall not exceed the amount which a purser would have received for performing the same duties.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear the report in this case, to see on what grounds this claim is based.

The Clerk read the following report made by Mr. MALLORY, on the 1st of March last:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Otway H. Berryman, praying to be allowed the amount of money paid by him in the adjustment of his accounts as purser, have had the same under consideration, and report:

That the grounds relied upon by Lieutenant Berryman are substantially those which induced Congress to grant relief to Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, at the present session, and your committee cannot distinguish between them.

Lieutenant Berryman assumed the command of the United States schooner On-ka-hy-o in October, 1846, under an order from the Navy Department, dated the 20th October, 1846, and he immediately entered upon special duty, and performed active and arduous service in the Gulf of Mexico, to Brazil and Chagres, during twenty-two months, which was terminated by the total shipwreck of the vessel on a sunken reef, in July, 1848.

With his command he was ordered to perform the duties of purser to the vessel, and these duties he performed throughout the whole period of his command.

No adjustment of his accounts took place until his return to the United States, when it was found that he had actually expended as purser more money, by $2,325, than he could produce the requisite vouchers for. This sum he paid to the Government, and his accounts were balanced accordingly.

The memorialist alleges that he has diligently and faithfully kept and disbursed the means intrusted to him as purser, to pay the lawful liabilities of the Government, and that the omission to take and return the proper vouchers for all his expenditures was alone the result of his ignorance of and his want of practice in the duties of purser.

The memorialist has a family to support, dependent upon him. He had a small landed estate, which he sold to pay his deficiency, and himself and family have thereby become subjected to great pecuniary embarrassment.

Your committee, from an examination of the memorial and its accompanying papers, and from inquiries also at the Navy Department, are satisfied that the memorialist, whose character and standing as an officer and a man are irreproachable, did faithfully disburse the means intrusted to him in the payment of the proper liabilities of the Government; and that his ignorance of his accounts, and of the importance of carefully preserving vouchers for every expenditure, was due to his general want of familiarity with the duties of his incidental post of purser. He received no compensation for the performance of these duties, nor could he receive any legally. His deficiency is the result of no misapplication of the means of the Government, of no want of due care and diligence in guarding and preserving them. The Government has had the benefit of the expenditure.

The amount of disbursements by memorialist as purser, during the period referred to, for which he obtained credit at the Department, were $21,951 50.

Your committee deem it a proper case for relief, and report a bill accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURSE OF PROCEEDING.

Mr. STUART. I am not satisfied with the manner in which we are proceeding, and I hope the Senate will agree to reconsider the order that was made, and let us go back to the commencement of the Calendar, and proceed with the cases understandingly. We spend nearly half the time in reading at length bills that are objected to; and if we require the reading of the reports, and then object to the bills, we shall get through very few cases. I hope we shall go back. The last case in which I had the report read was not a very satisfactory one, but yet I allowed it to pass. I move to reconsider the order that was made this morning.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope we shall not do that. I assure the Senator from Michigan that I have had the reports before me, and I have watched the bills as they have come up, and suggested objection to every one which I thought improper. He can do the same.

Mr. STUART. I am not so fortunate. I am not able to read. The condition of my eyes is such that I cannot read these reports. I am not satisfied with the bill which passed previously to the last one; I doubt very much whether it is a proper case; but if we go back, we shall save time. We read a bill; then we read a report; and the chances are, even that after that, the whole case is objected to, and that time is utterly lost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to reconsider the vote directing the order of proceeding with the Private Calendar.

The motion was not agreed to.

WILLIAM D. MOSELEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 172) for the relief of William D. Moseley.

Mr. STUART. I object to it.

Mr. YULEE. I am satisfied, if the bill and report are read, there will be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable. The Senator from Michigan objects.

Mr. YULEE. I presume the Senator does not intend to object generally and indiscriminately, because it is in defiance of the order—

Mr. STUART. I thought I knew what it was.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to the bill passing in this way now. I think it requires examination.

WILLIAM MARVIN.

The bill (S. No. 177) to confirm to William Marvin title to lands in East Florida, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Under its provisions, the grant to Bernardo Segui of seven thousand acres of land, lying on the east side of the St. John's river, in East Florida, between the place called Dunn's Lake and that known as Horse Landing, including the place called Buffalo Bluff, made by Estrada, the then Governor of the province of East Florida, on the 20th of December, 1815, will be confirmed to the grantee and those claiming under him; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office will be directed to cause the lands described in the grant to be surveyed to the claimant, without prejudice to any third person.

Mr. KING. If there is a report in that case, I should like to hear it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I may perhaps save a little time by stating, in a word, the facts of this case. This is the case of a claim for land in Florida. It was presented before the commissioners, and recommended for confirmation, but that report was not confirmed at the time. Congress afterwards passed two successive laws requiring holders of claims to present them for confirmation within a limited time, or they should be forever barred. It appears by the papers that this land belonged to minor heirs of the grantee, those minors living in New York; and their tutors paid no attention to the matter. They then brought a suit in Florida for the confirmation of the lands, and recovered in the district court in Florida, but on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, it was decided that the district court had no jurisdiction, because they had applied too late; the time was lost by their being minors, living in New York, and their guardian neglecting to present their case. The proposition now is to confirm their title, notwithstanding that neglect.

Mr. KING. I proposed to have the report read, to see who was in possession of the land. If these people have possession, and nobody disputes it, would not their title be good without an act of Congress?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It will be treated as public land if it is not confirmed.

Mr. KING. I do not insist on the reading of the report.

Mr. STUART. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question—whether this confirmation interferes at all in its extent with other claims, so that there will be a resulting claim against the United States to make up the deficiency?

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is expressly precluded in the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLIVIER LANDRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Olivier Landry, of the State of Louisiana.

It proposes to confirm the heirs and legal representatives and assigns of Olivier Landry in their title to a certain tract of land situated in township ten south, range five east, in the southwestern district of Louisiana, containing two hundred and thirty acres and eighty-four hundredths of an acre; but this confirmation is only to be construed as a relinquishment of any title that the United States may have to the lands, and is not to affect any title of any third person.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. KANE'S EXPEDITION.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. No. 20) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay to the officers and seamen of the expedition in search of Dr. Kane the same rate of pay that was allowed to the officers and seamen of the expedition under Lieutenant De Haven.

Mr. CLAY. I object to that. Let it lie over.

CHARNER T. SCAIFE.

The bill (S. No. 183) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Charner T. Scaife, administrator of Gilbert Stalker, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow $5,645 16 in full for the use and service of the steamboat James Adams, belonging to Gilbert Stalker, from the 1st of August, 1841, to the 9th of July, 1842.

In December, 1840, Captain Ogden, quartermaster United States Army, chartered the steamboat James Adams, at $2,500 dollars per month. On the 26th April the boat was discharged. She was subsequently chartered, at different times, at $2,000 per month, and at $1,800 per month, all for service on the Florida coast during the Seminole war. The amount chargeable on the charter parties was duly paid. The present claim is for an additional allowance of $500 per month, from the 1st August, 1841, to 9th July, 1842, founded on a parol contract between the owner of the boat and General Worth, the commanding officer in Florida, on the part of the Government. General Worth states that he has a distinct recollection of the circumstances, and of his assurance to Mr. Stalker "that, if he continued the vessel in the public service, to which the vessel was, at that time, indispensable, he should be paid an amount equal to his original contract." This promise, Captain Ogden, assistant quartermaster, says, "was predicated upon the unusually severe and destructive service required of the boat." Captain Ogden adds: "The rapid deterioration of the steamer, from the unusual service required of it, the promise of General Worth of an increased payment on that account, and the fact that Mr. Stalker would certainly have withdrawn his boat from the service if he had not expected the increase," &c., renders the payment a matter of common justice. The Court of Claims decide that, "as the service, to procure which the promise was made, was not required by the charter party, it cannot be said that the promise was without consideration. Neither can it be said that the promise was made without authority, it having been made by the commanding officer, in the presence of the quartermaster. It would, no doubt, have been more regular if the General had caused a new charter party to be executed; but still, as the unusual service was performed in consequence of the promise, it seems to be proper that the Government should pay for it."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN ROBB.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 184) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of John Robb, which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Robb the sum of $2,876 73 as a compensation in full for his service as acting Secretary of War in the years 1832 and 1833. The Committee on Claims reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to account with, and allow to John Robb, late chief clerk in the War Department, for the time he discharged the duties of acting Secretary of War, by appointment from the President of the United States, the same compensation as was then allowed by law to the head of the War Department, deducting therefrom the compensation received by the said John Robb as chief clerk of said Department during the same time, the same to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

SAN FRANCISCO HOSPITAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 2) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of the contractors for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the accounts upon principles of equity and justice.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment to strike out the words "upon principles of equity and justice, the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, and to pay to said contractor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, whatever amount may be found to be justly due to him under the said contract," and insert:

And adjust the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, and to pay to said contractor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount that may be found to be justly due to him under the contracts made between said contractor and the proper officers of the Government in reference to said building.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not desire to interpose any objection to the settlement of this contractor's accounts, but I do not understand the object of the resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the contractor what is due him under his contract. Why is that necessary?

Mr. IVERSON. I will state it in a moment. There is no appropriation now, and that is the reason the Secretary cannot pay the money.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This resolution does not make any appropriation.

Mr. IVERSON. Yes it does.

Mr. BROWN. It appropriates the whole Treasury. Let it lie over.

The resolution was passed over.

BENJAMIN E. EDWARDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 186) to confirm the title of Benjamin E. Edwards to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. STUART. I object to that.

A. W. MACPHERSON.

The next was the bill (S. No. 187) for the relief of A. W. Macpherson, which proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to audit and settle his accounts for furnishing the district and circuit court rooms, for the use of the courts of the United States, in the city of San Francisco, allowing him such prices for the articles furnished as, under all circumstances, shall appear reasonable and just.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let that be passed over.

EDWARD N. KENT.

The bill (S. No. 188) for the relief of Edward N. Kent, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to direct the payment to Edward N. Kent, of New York, $20,000, in full compensation for the perpetual use, in all the present and future minting establishments of the United States, of the apparatus for separating gold and other precious metals from foreign substances, of which he is the inventor and patentee; but he is first to secure to the United States the perpetual use of the apparatus to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let that go over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow the report to be read? It is a short one. I think it will satisfy everybody.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will hear the report.

The Clerk read the following report made by Mr. FESSENDEN on the 9th of March:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Edward N. Kent, with the accompanying papers, report:

That the petitioner is the inventor of an "apparatus for separating gold and other precious metals," which has been secured to him by letters patent, dated December 4, 1835, and February 28, 1836, respectively.

Mr. Butterworth, Superintendent of the Assay Office at New York, in a letter to the chairman of your committee, dated January 20, 1857, says:

"In the operations of melting and refining, a considerable portion of the precious metals will be temporarily absorbed by the crucibles and fluxes, and mixed with the ashes of the furnaces and the sweepings of the floors. A large amount of material thus accumulates, from which, by some method, the precious metal must be recovered. The amount thus recovered at this office is about two hundred thousand dollars per year. A portion still remains, however, mixed with the materials which have been subjected to the processes employed. This residuum is technically termed 'sweep,' and it has been the practice of the Government to sell this sweep to the smelters of this country and of Europe."

It has been proved to your committee that the method employed in minting operations, previously to the invention and employment of Mr. Kent's operations, for the purpose of recovering the precious metals thus accumulated, was exceedingly imperfect and defective. It was very prejudicial to the health of persons exposed to the operation, by reason of the large quantities of fine dust liberated in sifting; so much so, in one instance, as to cause death. It was expensive, requiring a large amount of labor, crucibles, and fluxes; and it occasioned a very considerable percentage of yearly loss on the "sweep" sold, namely, about ten to twelve cents per pound.

Mr. Kent's apparatus was introduced, at his request, into the assay office at New York, in July 1855, with a view of testing its merits. It was designed by the inventor to lessen, or avoid, all the difficulties above stated, particularly, by recovering a much larger portion of the precious metals from their admixture with the substances, so to impoverish the sweep as to diminish the percentage of loss on its sale.

The apparatus proved so successful, in all particulars, as to induce the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia to direct an examination and report upon its merits. The report was of so favorable a character as to lead to its subsequent introduction, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, into the principal minting establishments of the United States, in all of which it has since continued in constant use.

The testimony furnished by Mr. Kent, which accompanies his petition and this report, comes principally from the officers of the Mint at Philadelphia, and the assay office at New York, and establishes, to the entire satisfaction of your committee, the great importance of the apparatus in minting operations. It accomplishes all the purposes for which it was designed.

Mr. Butterworth, in the communication before cited, says:

"Mr. Kent's invention effects a saving of two thirds the labor required by the old process; it supersedes almost entirely the expensive operations of fluxing, owing to the thoroughness with which it separates the precious metals from the sweeps; and, by impoverishing the sweeps to one tenth their former value, it effects a very material diminution of the loss on their sale in the market. I am satisfied that the saving to the Government, effected by Mr. Kent's invention, at this office alone, is about six thousand dollars per year."

The evidence is equally conclusive, that, by avoiding the dry sifting, this apparatus relieves the workmen from all the deleterious effects upon health produced by the old process.

By calculations made at the Mint and assay office, there can be no reasonable doubt that the saving to the Government effected by Mr. Kent's apparatus, at those two establishments, will amount, in the fourteen years of his patent, to a sum exceeding one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Estimating an equal saving at the other establishments, which the witnesses assume to be a fair basis of calculation, the whole benefit derived by the Government from this important invention, during the continuance of the patent, will exceed two hundred and forty thousand dollars.

It is quite obvious that the use of Mr. Kent's apparatus is of too much importance and value to be dispensed with in the minting operations of the Government. It is equally obvious that it can only be used legally with his consent. Were it otherwise, there is no reason why the United States should not afford him a just and reasonable compensation for great benefits received through his labor and ingenuity. One of the witnesses, (Mr. Terry), who has been connected with the assay office from its commencement, says in a letter to Mr. Kent: "Your apparatus is constructed on the soundest principles of mechanical and chemical science; and is, I think, hardly susceptible of much improvement."

All the principal officers connected with both the establishments before named concur in the opinion that Mr.

Kent is honestly entitled to remuneration, and that the continued use of his apparatus in all the minting operations of the United States cannot be dispensed with.

The case is not without precedent. The sum of $2,500 was heretofore appropriated by Congress for the purchase of the perpetual right to use, in the Mint and branch mints of the United States, an apparatus invented by Rufus Tyler for counting coins.—United States Statutes, vol. v., p. 688.

The petitioner thinks that he is entitled to receive from the Government the amount of $20,000 for the perpetual right to use his apparatus in all the minting establishments of the United States. Taking into consideration the great benefits conferred, the fact that this sum is only one twelfth of the amount which will be actually saved to the Government through his instrumentality, and the very limited compensation which he will be likely to receive from other quarters, your committee think his demand not unreasonable, and accordingly report a bill for his relief.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am satisfied.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A little verbal amendment is suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. Briggs,] which ought, perhaps, to be made. He suggests that there may possibly be a claim for the past use of the apparatus. The amendment is to make it read, "for the use heretofore and the perpetual use hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUFUS DWINEL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel, directing the payment of $11,748 03, interest on a claim formerly allowed to him.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let that lie over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let the report be read, and perhaps the Senator will be satisfied.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have read the report. It can be discussed afterwards.

The bill was passed over.

Mr. BENJAMIN subsequently said: A few moments ago I objected to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel. I have since run over the report, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STUART. I am opposed to going back.

PIERRE GRIGNON.

The bill (S. No. 190) for the confirmation of a certain land claim in favor of Pierre Grignon, or his legal representatives, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm in favor of Pierre Grignon, or his legal representatives, the claim to a certain tract of land situated on the west side of Fox river, Green Bay, Wisconsin, immediately below the first creek that empties into the river, and having a front of about fifteen acres, with such depth as shall suffice to make the whole tract equal to six hundred and forty superficial acres; but the act is only to be construed to vest in Grignon, or his representatives, the rights, title, and interest in the land now held or possessed by the United States, and not in any way to impair any bona fide rights, interest, or claims, acquired by any other person under adverse grants, concessions, or purchases, made prior to the passage of the act.

Mr. KING. I should like to hear the report in that case.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state in a word what the case is. This is a claim for land which was reported for confirmation under the law providing for the confirmation of private titles in Michigan Territory. This particular tract was excluded from confirmation because it was within the limits of a military reservation. The Secretary of War now reports that it is no longer required for military purposes. It was only excluded on that ground, and of course it is proper the claimant should now be confirmed in his title. That is the whole case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STURGES, BENNETT AND CO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 121) from the Court of Claims for the relief of Sturges, Bennett & Co., merchants of the city of New York, which was reported on adversely by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is an adverse report on that bill. Let it be passed over. It can be taken up afterwards.

CONFIRMATION OF LAND CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 41) for the relief of Manuel Liza, Joachim Liza, and others, and to provide for the location of certain confirmed private land claims, which was reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims, with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill, and insert, as a substitute, the following:

That the decisions in favor of certain land claimants herein made by the recorder of land titles in the States of Missouri and the two commissioners associated with him, by virtue of an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri," approved July 9, 1832, and act supplemental thereto, approved March 2, 1833, as entered in the transcript of decisions transmitted by the said recorder and commissioners to the Commissioners of the General Land Office; which said claims are named and numbered as follows: Manuel de Liza, No. 33; John Coontz and Hempstead, No. 44; Matthew Saucier, No. 57; Charles Tayon, No. 67; the sons of Joseph M. Pepin, No. 74; Louis Lorimer, No. 87; Bartholemew Cousin, No. 89; Manuel Gonzales Moro, No. 95; Seneca Rawlins, No. 104; William L. Long, No. 106; Joachim Liza, No. 133; Francis Lacombe, No. 34; Israel Dodge, No. 338; Joseph Silvain, No. 293; John P. Cabanis, No. 298; William Hartley, No. 301; Andrew Chevalier, No. 292; William Morrison, No. 307; Solomon Bellew, No. 308; Paschal Detchemendez, No. 309; Baptist Amure, No. 310; Alexander Maurice, No. 323; John Baptiste Vallee, No. 334; said decisions above named being in the first class of claims acted upon by said board; also the claim of Regis Loisel, No. 6, in the second class acted on by said board, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed to the respective claimants or their legal representatives.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the decisions in favor of land claimants made by P. Grimes, Joshua Lewis, and Thomas B. Robertson, commissioners appointed to adjust private land claims in the eastern district of the Territory of Orleans, communicated to the House of Representatives by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 9th day of January, 1812, and which is found in the American State Papers, Public Lands, (Duff Green's edition,) volume two, from page 324 to 367, inclusive, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, saving and reserving, however, to all adverse claimants the right to assert the validity of their claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, however, That any claim so recommended for confirmation, but which may have been rejected, in whole or in part, by any subsequent board of commissioners, be, and the same is hereby, specially excepted from confirmation.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the locations authorized by the preceding section shall be entered with the register of the proper land office, who shall, on application for that purpose, make out for such claimant, or his legal representatives, (as the case may be,) a certificate of location, which shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said Commissioner that said certificate has been fairly obtained, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then, and in that case, patents shall be issued for the land so located, as in other cases; and for each and every certificate, as aforesaid, issued by the register of any land office, he shall receive the sum of one dollar; that in all cases where any private land claim has been confirmed by Congress, and the same, in whole or in part, has not been located or satisfied, either for want of a specific location prior to such confirmation, or for any reason whatsoever, other than a discovery of fraud in such claim subsequent to such confirmation, it shall be the duty of the surveyor general of the district in which such claim was situated, upon satisfactory proof that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, to issue to the claimant, or his legal representatives, a certificate of location for a quantity of land equal to that so confirmed and unsatisfied; which certificate may be located upon any of the public lands of the United States, subject to sale at private entry, at a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre: Provided, That such location shall conform to legal divisions and sub-divisions.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the register of the proper land office, upon the location of such certificate shall issue to the person entitled thereto a certificate of entry, upon which, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that such certificate has been fairly obtained, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, a patent shall issue, as in other cases.

Mr. POLK. I wish to add an amendment which I suppose will be acceptable to the Senator from Louisiana, the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims. I wish to call his attention to it. In the substitute as reported, in line thirteen of section three, I propose to insert after the word "cases" the words "of confirmation by this act or," so that the clause will read, "That in all cases of confirmation by this act, or where any private land claims," &c.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

A. S. H. WHITE.

The bill (S. No. 195) for the relief of Ashton S. H. White, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to allow to A. S. H. White $561 02, in full for his services as assistant secretary to sign land patents under an appointment from President Pierce, of date of December 12, 1856, from that date to February 27, 1857.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 196) authorizing the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States to enter a certain tract of land in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. BIGGS. I object to that bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina to let the report be read. It is only five or six lines.

Mr. BIGGS. I have no objection to the reading of the report; but I am opposed to the principle of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) As the Senator objects to the bill, it will be passed over.

JOSEPH HARDY AND ALTON LONG.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 198) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long.

Mr. STUART. That is a case to which I interposed objection the other day. I ask that it be laid over.

The bill was laid over.

LIVINGSTON, KINKEAD, AND COMPANY.

The bill (S. No. 199) for the relief of Livingston, Kinkead, & Company, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to authorize the payment to Livingston, Kinkead, & Company, merchants, of Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, of the sum of $10,070, as indemnity for the amount of money of which they were robbed by a party of Sioux Indians, near Fort Laramie, in the Indian territory, in November, 1854.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is no report accompanying that bill. It provides for the payment of ten or eleven thousand dollars. Unless there is a statement that we can understand, I object to it.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Senator from Louisiana is mistaken. There is a report in that case. I made it myself.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is not printed.

Mr. STUART. The Calendar states that the report is not printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report, but it is not printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I know there is a report.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read the report made during the last Congress by Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, by which it appeared that the robbery was committed while Mr. Kinkead was passenger in a mail-coach, from Salt Lake City to Independence, Missouri. He was the only passenger who escaped massacre by the Indians. The band that committed the outrage were nominally at peace with the United States, but a state of hostilities was soon after recognized, and General Harney dispatched to the plains for their chastisement. According to the spirit of the intercourse laws, the United States would be bound to pay the loss, indemnifying themselves by reserving the amount from the annuities payable to the Indians; but as the depredation was committed by a straggling band, and the annuities to the Sioux are altogether payable in goods, and of small amount, it is proposed that the Government of the United States shall pay at once the indemnity which the intercourse laws guarantee in such cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE FISHER'S REPRESENTATIVES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 21) devolving upon the Secretary of War the execution of the act of Congress entitled "An act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is a public act. Let it lie over.

Mr. BROWN. That is a private joint resolution.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Let it be read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the duties imposed, or required to be performed, by the act of Congress entitled "An act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854, including the act to which it is supplemental, be, and the same are hereby, transferred to the Secretary of War, who shall proceed de novo to execute the same in their plain and obvious meaning: Provided, nevertheless, That from any amount which may be found just and equitably due to the legal representatives of George Fisher, deceased, there shall be deducted all sums which may have been heretofore allowed and paid by the United States.

Mr. BIGGS. I wish to hear the report in that case.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution; not that I know anything about its merits, but I see that the report is very long, and its reading will consume much time.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will state the case. It was before the Committee on Indian Affairs last year, when I was a member of that committee. It is a plain case. The object is to enforce a law already passed.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not know anything of the merits of the case; but I understood that we were to go through with those bills that should lead to no discussion.

Mr. TOOMBS. This admits of none. There is no plainer case on record.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will state the case. A bill was passed, several years ago, for the relief of the heirs of George Fisher. A portion of the items in the account were thrown out for the want of proof. The parties subsequently got the proof, came before Congress, and obtained an act directing an allowance for that which they had failed to prove before. When the proof was presented at the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury, under the new bill, proposed to deduct some interest which had been allowed upon the first account, by way of a set-off to what was allowed under the new bill. I recollect it was brought before the Indian Committee, and we were unanimously of opinion that he had no such right—not only that the claim was just, but that the deduction was improper, the law being imperative. Mr. Guthrie refused to go into the account only on that basis, and the present Secretary of the Treasury, although holding entirely different opinions, as I understand, yet, inasmuch as it had been decided, would not open the case without an act of Congress. The joint resolution only proposes, in this case, to allow the law to be executed according to its plain meaning and intent. The Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously reported that no other legislation was necessary at all; that the law was full and perfect; and this only proposes that the Secretary of War shall go on and execute the law.

Mr. BIGGS. My attention has been called to this claim, and it involves some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from North Carolina will give way for a moment I will add an additional fact to what was stated by the Senator from Georgia. The present Secretary of the Treasury declines to look into the case because Mr. Guthrie had declined to do it; and the present resolution provides for transferring the execution of the law from the Treasury Department to the Secretary of War, as the matter comes properly before the Secretary of War, the claim being for losses sustained by depredations committed by the Indians during a state of hostilities. Secretary Guthrie declined to look into the account, or to suffer the Second Auditor to do so, on the ground, as he alleged, that the testimony had been once looked into, and that Congress, when they passed the second law, were mistaken in the fact; but Secretary Guthrie was himself mistaken, as appears by the affidavit of Mr. Bibb, by the certificate of the Governor of Alabama, which shows that the testimony was authenticated nearly two years after the decision was made. It is a very clear case; and the resolution simply provides that the execution of the law shall be transferred from one Department to the other. It does not make any appropriation whatever.

Mr. BIGGS. It is with reluctance that I interpose any objection to this case. I have examined it, and am certainly not satisfied in regard to it. It involves an appropriation of $15,000.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is mistaken. It does not appropriate one dollar. It provides for executing the existing law by the Department; that is all. It neither appropriates nor attempts to appropriate.

Mr. BIGGS. The claim is of twenty or thirty thousand dollars; and this is a resolution to transfer the execution of the law, which it is alleged ought to have required a former Secretary of the Treasury to pay the money. It is with reluctance that I interpose an objection; but I have examined the case, and on examination I am not satisfied that the joint resolution ought to pass. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie over.

CHARLES PORTERFIELD.

The bill (S. No. 203) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to require the Secretary of the Interior to issue to William Kinney and Thomas J. Michie, executors of the last will and testament of Robert Porterfield, deceased, a number of warrants, equal to six thousand one hundred and thirty-three acres of land, according to the usual subdivisions of the public surveys, in quantity not less than forty acres; to be by them located on any of the public lands which have been or may be surveyed, and which have not been otherwise appropriated at the time of such location, within any of the States or Territories of the United States, where the minimum price shall not exceed $1 25 per acre, and appropriated according to the directions contained in the last will and testament of Robert Porterfield, in the same manner and for the purposes directed in regard to the lands which were lost by his legal representatives in the action with Clack and others, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. STUART. I want to have that bill amended, so that it shall apply to lands that are subject to private entry. As it is now, it would apply to any lands, whether they had ever been offered at public sale or not.

Mr. EVANS. It was not intended to make it applicable to any except to lands made liable to private entry.

Mr. STUART. I supposed not. My amendment is, in line ten, after the words "public lands," to insert "subject to private entry."

Mr. BENJAMIN. The same thing is repeated twice over in the sentence. The sentence now reads: "to be by them located on any of the public lands, which have been or may be surveyed, and which have not been otherwise appropriated at the time of the location, within any of the States or Territories of the United States, where the minimum price for the same shall not exceed the sum of $1 25 per acre."

Mr. STUART. The Senator will see that my amendment is still necessary. The minimum price of all public land except reserved lands is $1 25 an acre; but until it has been once offered for sale, it is not subject to entry at all; but by the original language of this bill it would be before it was offered for sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk read the report made by Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, on the 17th of March.

Mr. STUART. I think that case was once before the Committee on Public Lands; at all events it was brought to my attention heretofore, and it did not meet my approbation. I therefore must object to the bill to-day. Perhaps at a future day I may think differently; but at present I am not willing to allow the bill to pass.

The bill was passed over.

SUSANNAH HAYNE PINCKNEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S.

No. 205) for the relief of Susannah Hayne Pinckney, sole heir of Captain Richard Shubrick.

It proposes to allow the seven years' half pay of a captain of infantry, as promised by the resolve of August 24, 1786, which amounts to $1,680.

Mr. SLIDELL. I should like to hear the report in that case.

Mr. STUART. I object to the bill.

Mr. CLAY. There are about six cases of that character reported; and I am satisfied that those who have not given this subject any attention are unconscious of the mischief that may result from the passage of any one of these bills, and whenever we go back and take them up, I wish to enlighten those who have not read something on the subject. I am opposed to the consideration of the bill.

The bill was passed over.

JOHN HASTINGS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of John Hastings, collector of the port of Pittsburg.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to that bill. When it comes up I shall have something to say upon it.

The bill was passed over.

JOSEPH C. G. KENNEDY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 209) for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, which proposes to allow him $2,000 for damages to buildings rented from him by the United States for the use of the census office.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let that be passed over.

The next was the bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in the settlement of Mr. Kennedy's accounts, as late secretary of the census board, and superintending clerk of the census, to allow him at the rate of $3,000 per annum, in full compensation for all services rendered by him in either or both capacities.

Mr. CLAY. Let that bill be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a very clear case. I hope the Senator will hear the report. This gentleman served in these two capacities.

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection to hearing the report, but we paid one man, I know, for this work; and I should require a very strong showing before consenting to pay another one.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is the only one ever paid; and he has not been fully paid yet.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I object to the bill.

The bill was passed over.

REIMBURSEMENT OF THE STATE OF MAINE.

The bill (S. No. 216) authorizing the payment to the State of Maine of certain expenses agreed to be refunded to her by the fifth article of the treaty between the United States of America and her Britannic Majesty, dated the 9th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1842, was read the second time.

Mr. CLAY. Is that a private bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been so considered.

Mr. CLAY. I did not know that the State of Maine was a private corporation. I always supposed it was one of the sovereign States of this Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BRIGHT.) It has been ruled usually that a bill for the relief of a State is in the nature of a private bill.

Mr. STUART. I shall want to discuss that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. No. 216) is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STUART. That is a debatable question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that it is a private bill.

Mr. STUART. I do not deny that; but I object to the bill. I examined the question and discussed it, at the last session. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken. This is a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on a claim arising under the treaty. It is not the same question to which he alludes.

Mr. STUART. Then I do not object to it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the accounting officers to ascertain, as among the expenditures of the State of Maine in defending the territory heretofore in dispute with Great Britain, the amounts paid in borrowing money for those expenditures beyond the rate of six per cent. per annum, whether in the form of discounts or otherwise, in all cases in which the principal of such expenditures and interest upon them at the rate of six per cent. have heretofore been refunded to that State by the United States. In making this ascertainment, the accounting officers are to compute the principal and interest of the difference between the cash received by Maine in negotiating stocks and notes, and the nominal amount of such stocks and notes, and the interest accrued thereon, and in cases where Maine was obliged, in negotiating for moneys, to increase the rate of interest on previous loans, the amount of such increase is to be computed and allowed, but not so as to reckon interest upon interest.

Mr. CLAY. I shall object to the interest allowed, without knowing anything of the merits of the bill.

Mr. POLK. I think the Senator is mistaken in the view he takes of it. The bill does not propose to allow interest as interest at all. It proposes to allow to the State of Maine so much as she suffered in the way of discount in the sale of her bonds for the purpose of raising money to prosecute the Aroostook war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is aware that the question is not debatable. Does the Senator from Alabama object to the bill?

Mr. CLAY. I prefer that it should go over.

The bill was passed over.

ROBERT DICKSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Robert Dickson, of the Kentucky volunteers, which was reported upon adversely from the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was passed over.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

The bill (S. No. 221) for the relief of Richard W. Meade, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to allow R. W. Meade, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy, $566 20, being the amount of expenses incurred by him and his clerk for subsistence, while under orders of the Navy Department, and detained on shore at San Francisco, from July 15 to September 30, 1849, less the amount already received by them for commutation of their rations during the same period.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES ANN M'CAULEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 223) for the relief of Frances Ann McCauley.

It provides for the payment to her, as widow of Daniel S. McCauley, deceased, late consul general of the United States at Alexandria, in Egypt, the sum of $4,200, for compensation for judicial services performed by her husband, from the 14th of August, 1848, to the 26th of October, 1852, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries," approved August 11, 1848, at the rate of $1,000 per annum.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk read the report made by Mr. Foot, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the 31st of March.

Mr. GREEN. I object to that bill.

MRS. HARRIET O. READ.

The bill (S. No. 226) for the relief of Mrs. Harriet O. Read, executrix of the late Brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

MILWAUKIE AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.

The bill (S. No. 249) to release to the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company the interest of the United States to a parcel of land, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that whatever of right, title, or interest, the United States has or may have in and to that certain tract or parcel of land situate in the Mississippi river, at the village of Prairie du Chien, in Wisconsin, opposite the depot grounds of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, (being a small island in low water, containing about thirty-five acres, separated from the main land upon the east bank of the river by a small channel or slough, and which, being overflowed at high water, has never been surveyed by the United States, to an extent equal in width to their present front on the river,) be released and quit-claimed to the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, to be held and enjoyed by the company for depot and other railroad purposes.

Mr. BIGGS. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. STUART from the Committee on Public Lands on the 8th of April:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, respectfully report:

That they are unanimously of the opinion that the prayer of the memorialists should be granted, and they report a bill for that purpose. The facts are substantially and truly stated in the memorial of the company, a copy of which is annexed to this report.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Wisconsin, respectfully represents that the western terminus of their road is on the east bank of the Mississippi river, at Prairie du Chien, in the said State of Wisconsin, at which point the company have purchased from the original proprietors, and are now the owners, in fee simple, of a tract of land used for depot purposes, embracing the whole river front of private land claims Nos. 36 and 37, of Lucius Lyon's survey of private land claims at Prairie du Chien, now of record in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; that lying in front of said depot grounds, and between them and the main channel of the river, is a small island, which is separated from the main land by a narrow channel or slough, and which island and slough it is necessary to cross in order to reach the main channel in lower stages of water; and, in order to perfect a convenient landing, it is necessary to bridge the slough and fill the island, as well as to make other improvements, which the company are deterred from doing, for the reason that certain parties claim that the island is the property of the General Government, and intend to make application for the same under the preemption laws; that the island is almost wholly opposite to the grounds of said company, is low, wet, and marshy, and valueless for agricultural purposes, and in high water is overflowed from eight to ten feet; that it is about fifty chains long by seven chains wide at low water, and contains about thirty-five acres of land, and is not surveyed or shown upon the maps of surveys made by said Lucius Lyon, and has heretofore been considered of no value.

And your memorialists further represent, that they have constructed a railroad from Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan, to the Mississippi river, without the benefit of a land grant or other aid from the Government.

Your memorialists, therefore, respectfully ask that an act be passed confirming the title to said island to the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company.

Read and adopted, at Milwaukee, this 3d day of March, A. D. 1858.

JOHN CATTIN,

President of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Co.

Attest: WILLIAM TAINTON, Secretary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER STEVENSON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson.

Its purpose is to require the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the legal representatives of Alexander Stevenson, a soldier of the revolutionary war, in trust for the heirs of Stevenson, the sum of $654, the amount of money due to him from the time of his enlistment, January 1, 1776, until the time of his discharge, in 1783.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. CLAY. I object to the passage of the bill until I hear the report.

The Clerk read the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, from which it appeared that Alexander Stevenson enlisted as a soldier of the Revolution in the month of February, in the year 1776, was in the battle of the Three Rivers, in Lower Canada, where he was taken prisoner and detained as such till the year 1783, when he was discharged in an enfeebled state of health. It appears from the records of the War Department that he enlisted for one year, and not for and during the war; but having served till the end of the war, his case comes within the spirit and meaning of the law providing relief for those who enlisted "for and during the war." He received but one month's pay from the Government, owing to the fact that he was a prisoner from 1776 till 1783.

In view of all the facts and circumstances attending this claim, the committee believe the sum reported is the smallest amount the Government should think of paying. The claim, it seems, was presented in 1837, and had the favorable action of two committees; passed the House of Representatives at the last session, with a clause allowing interest upon the arrears of pay, and was objected to in the Senate on the ground that the Government ought not to pay interest, on the presumption that she is always ready to pay all her just debts upon demand. The committee have refused to allow interest, even from the time demand was made, although there are precedents to be found justifying such allowance.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator who reported the bill whether this is to allow the commutation of seven years' half pay?

Mr. EVANS. No; it is his pay as a common soldier. He was enlisted, and marched to Canada, and in the battle of the Three Rivers he was taken prisoner.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw my objection. It does not come within the class of cases I supposed.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LAND TITLES IN MAINE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 250) to provide for the quieting of certain land titles in the late disputed territory in the State of Maine, and for other purposes.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let that bill go over. It will take too long to consider it now.

CHARLES M'CORMICK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 252) for the relief of Charles McCormick, assistant surgeon in the United States Navy.

Mr. CLAY. I object to that bill.

F. M. GUNNELL.

The bill (S. No. 253) for the relief of F. M. Gunnell, passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, was read the second time, as in Committee of the Whole.
